AGENDA
Collision course
 At the end of her dramatic press conference on the Middle East peace process this week, US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright hurried to the Capitol for a meeting with a group of congressmen known to be supporters of Israel.
 This was the last in a series of meetings which she held on the eve of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's arrival. They were aimed at reducing the political fallout likely to affect President Bill Clinton following the Israeli counter-attack against increasing American pressure.
 Key Jewish activists relate how, immediately after Netanyahu announced at the weekend that he would not be attending the summit meeting with Yasser Arafat at the White House, administration officials attempted to persuade him to cancel his participation in the APAC convention, due to take place next Sunday.

Capital serial stabber kills first victim

By ELI WOLFGELER
 An Arab construction worker was knifed to death in Jerusalem early yesterday morning on his way to work in what police say is the work of a serial anti-Arab stabber. The assailant has struck six times in the last three months in and around the haredi neighborhoods of Mea She'arim and adjacent Beit Yisrael.
 Khairi Alkam, 51, from the city's A-Tur neighborhood, was the first fatality of the six knifings. He was the father of nine.
 "With near certainty I can say there is a link between the incidents, including the incident this morning, aside from the fact this incident is fatal," said Jerusalem police chief Cmdr. Yair Yitzhaki. "It seems that this is the act of one person. However, we are not ruling out the possibility that additional people were involved."
 Police are theorizing that the assailant is a Jew avenging attacks on Jews by Arabs. The other stabbings occurred on February 17, March 10, March 12, April 29, and May 7. In five of the stabbings, the attacker left his knife at the scene.
 Police also are investigating a connection between the stabber and three firebomb attacks on an apartment in which three young Arab women live at the edge of Mea She'arim. One of the firebombings occurred the night of the April 29 stabbing. No one was injured in the three firebombings, but the second one, on November 30, severely damaged the apartment's entrance. The first occurred October 13.
 Police spokesman Shmuel Ben-Ruby said police are not certain the stabbing perpetrator is from the Mea She'arim area.
 "We simply don't know at this point," he said.
 Ben-Ruby said a special seven-man unit has been working full-time on the series of stabbings. Police detained a suspect earlier yesterday but later released him. Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert said it is unfair to criticize police for not taking the necessary measures in the investigations of murdered Arabs.
 "We don't always find the murderers of Jews, and we don't always find the murderers of Arabs," Olmert said. "It takes time, it takes a lot of effort, and it's not easy. I know that the police are making every possible effort to find out who is responsible for the murder of Arabs."
 Alkam was buried at the Moslem cemetery in the Old City yesterday evening. The family asked that no Jewish officials attend the funeral.
Steve Rodan and Mohammed Najib add:
 The Palestinian Authority and Hamas condemned Alkam's killing. One Palestinian legislator charged that he was slain by a newly formed Jewish extremist group.
 Alkam's family said he went to morning prayers at a mosque and at about 5 a.m. left for his job at a construction site in the Har Hotzvim Industrial Park in northwestern Jerusalem.
 Palestinian Legislative Council member Haim Khader said that at about 5:10 a.m. a group of what he said were Jewish settlers attacked Alkam.
 "This is not the first time a [Palestinian] citizen has been stabbed," Abdul Khader said. "This is the sixth stabbing in less than four months. We view this with extreme gravity."
 "We have information that confirms that a Jewish terrorist militia is working in the Jerusalem area against Arab citizens," he said. "We had warned Israel many times that it must set limits on the practice of settlers, but the terrorist aggressions against Palestinian citizens are increasing."
 Abdul Khader added that he believes the Alkam killing will spark Palestinian revenge attacks in eastern Jerusalem.
 PA Chairman Yasser Arafat called the Alkam killing a "great crime" and said it was the work of Jewish settlers. He did not elaborate.

No progress in DC talks

PM, Albright to meet again today

By JAY BUSHINSKY and news agencies
 WASHINGTON — Talks here yesterday between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright aimed at getting the peace process back on track broke up after 90 minutes.
 While there was no indication whether headway was made, the State Department announced that Netanyahu and Albright would meet again today "in a continuation of this effort to overcome remaining differences."
 Albright left the downtown hotel where the talks were held immediately after the session without making any comment.
 Officials said working groups representing Israel and the US would continue the dialogue in the interim, in an effort to find a formula for an IDF withdrawal in the West Bank that would be acceptable to the Palestinian Authority.
 Israel Radio last night quoted a senior Israeli source in Washington as saying that the two sides were discussing a previously reported possibility of staging the second redeployment in two phases — the first of 9 percent and the second of unstated size, after the Palestinians fulfill a series of obligations. Netanyahu has denied knowledge of any two-stage plan.
 Netanyahu went into his meeting with Albright in a feisty mood. The session took place in the prime minister's hotel less than five hours after his Israel Air Force jet landed at Washington Airport.
 The prime minister expressed regret that National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon had refused at the last minute to join him at the talks and also had declined to confer with him in advance of the crucial meeting with Albright.
 "It is essential to support the prime minister," he said. Asserting that he is in the midst of a "difficult campaign," Netanyahu told Israeli reporters that it is necessary "to stand shoulder to shoulder opposite the Americans."
 He denied that he has been keeping the inner cabinet in the dark about his discussions with American intermediaries.
 Sharon has accused Netanyahu of making commitments to the US peace team without cabinet authorization.
 Without specifying the exact percentage of West Bank territory from which the IDF could withdraw, Netanyahu expressed pride in having "lowered the Palestinians' expectations" by reducing the area being considered for evacuation "from 90% to 13%." He added that he has no doubt he will be able to get the projected redeployment through the cabinet and the Knesset.
 Netanyahu said the Palestinian Authority does not merit any territorial flexibility or compromise on Israel's part.
 "There has been no abrogation of the Palestinian National Covenant by the Palestinian National Council," he said, noting that Arafat had promised to revise the covenant in a letter to President Bill Clinton.
 "Why is it so difficult to convene the PNC?" he asked.
 Netanyahu also charged that the PA has not acted effectively or consistently in trying to suppress terrorist activity in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. He termed this an outright violation of the Hebron Agreement, despite the fact that it was concluded under American auspices.
 Hours before Netanyahu and Albright sat down, Clinton and Albright's spokesman sought to underscore Israel's strong ties with the United States.
 In Potsdam, Germany, Clinton said the administration is not prescribing all the terms for a settlement, but only trying to guide Israel and the Palestinians "over the hurdle" of a stalemate. Clinton said he is "hoping we can find an agreement based on the ideas we've presented."
 "We haven't tried to find a formula to resolve all the issues," Clinton told reporters. "We've tried to find a formula to get them over the hurdle."
 Following his afternoon meeting with Albright, Netanyahu was to go to Capitol Hill, where he already has considerable support for his position on the US withdrawal formula.
 At the State Department, spokesman James Rubin said, "Our ideas are virtually identical with the essential elements of the desires of the prime minister.... We believe Israel is engaged in an effort with us to put the peace process back on track."
 However, Clinton cautioned that "far more bad things are likely to happen than good things" with delay. And Rubin cautioned, "This phase of our efforts is rapidly drawing to a close."

EU to probe origin of Israeli exports

By Jerusalem Post Staff and news agencies
 BRUSSELS — The European Union said yesterday it will investigate new claims that products entering the EU under a "Made in Israel" label are in fact produced elsewhere, allowing Israeli exporters to claim illegal customs concessions.
 In a document on EU-Israeli trade ties, the EU executive commission said it suspects that many of these goods are Palestinian products originating in "east Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, West Bank, and Gaza Strip."
 "There is ample evidence that the practices of exporting Palestinian products under Israeli certificates of origin apply to a substantial proportion of total exports into the EU of Palestinian originating products," a statement by the commission said. It also said that Israeli trade barriers impede Palestinian economic development.
 The Foreign Ministry said in response that Israel considers the document a blatant infringement of the Paris Agreements between itself and the Palestinian Authority. The 1994 agreements are part of the Oslo Agreements and determine a single customs envelope between Israel and the Palestinians.
 The commission's intervention will damage the economic relations between Israel and the Palestinians, a ministry statement said. It added that the commission's one-sided document constitutes an attempt to prejudice Israel's borders, before these have been fully determined within the framework of negotiations with its neighbors.
 "Israel calls upon Council of Ministers to refrain from taking one-sided steps which could harm the peace process," the statement said.
 The commission said false labeling has allowed exporters to claim millions of dollars in customs concessions. The estimated loss to the EU is $44 million.

US alone on India sanctions

By PAUL TAYLOR
 LONDON (Reuters) — US President Bill Clinton's imposition of economic sanctions on India for its widely condemned nuclear tests won scant support from his allies and partners yesterday.
 Branding the Indian decision "a terrible mistake," Clinton announced sweeping US sanctions as India carried out two more underground explosions, following Monday's three blasts designed to tell the world it is a nuclear power.
 Japan, India's biggest aid donor, took largely symbolic punitive action.
 But Britain, usually Washington's staunchest European ally, joined France and Russia in opposing sanctions, while Germany was non-committal.
 The divergent reactions made it clear that, while leaders of the Group of Eight industrialized nations will unite in condemning India, there is no prospect of them agreeing on joint sanctions at a summit this weekend in Birmingham, England.
 In a clear shift from the lineup of major powers in the standoff with Iraq over its suspected weapons of mass destruction earlier this year, the US appeared to be alone in taking serious action.
 Clinton signed into immediate effect measures that will require the US to oppose loans to India by international lending agencies such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.
 "I believe they were unjustified," he said of the tests. "They clearly create a dangerous new instability in their region."

India tests pose a threat to Israel

By DAVID RUDGE
 India's nuclear tests could indirectly pose a threat to Israel, according to Haifa University security specialist Prof. Gabriel Ben-Dor.
 "I think this is very bad for Israel from several points of view," said Ben-Dor, head of the university's National Security Studies Program. "Firstly, it raises the question of punitive US action against India which might, in the future, be considered a precedent for similar action against Israel."
 Ben-Dor noted that Israel, like India, has not signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.
 "Secondly, and this is even more significant, the Indian tests are likely to give momentum to the Pakistani nuclear program and give it more legitimacy," he said. "This is certainly bad from our point of view, because the Pakistani nuclear program is supposed to be the source of the so-called Islamic bomb."
 "This is turn might become accessible, one way or another at a later stage, to various Islamic and Arab countries, including Iran. There is really no need to explain why this would be bad for us."
 "From these two perspectives, the nuclear tests conducted by India are bad news, quite apart from the instability that this is likely to cause in Asia itself."
 Ben-Dor added that Pakistan is likely to give its own nuclear program national priority "no matter what the cost," unless extremely strong action is taken against India.

At least 10 killed in IAF strike on terror base

By DAVID RUDGE and ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
 At least 10 people were killed and over 20 wounded in an IAF attack on a training base of a Palestinian terrorist group in the Syrian-controlled Bekaa Valley in eastern Lebanon early yesterday.
 The air raid was aimed at a base of the Syrian-backed Abu Musa group near Ta'anael, only a few kilometers from the Syrian border. The area is under the umbrella of Syria's anti-aircraft missile batteries, although none was fired during the air raid which took place shortly after 1 a.m.
 The precision strike apparently was aimed at preventing a planned attack on Israeli targets by the organization, which broke away from the mainstream Fatah in 1983 and is opposed to the peace process.
 According to reports from Lebanon, IAF planes came in from the Mediterranean, flew across the country and hit the base in at least three separate sorties, taking the terrorists by surprise while they were asleep.
 The IDF Spokesman issued a statement saying that the pilots reported accurate hits and that all the planes returned safely to base. Senior IDF sources said that the raid had been planned well in advance.
 The Abu Musa organization is not considered very strong. It has carried out a number of raids, but the last one was an attempt to infiltrate Israel from near Mt. Dov over a year ago.
 Senior defense officials insisted that no civilians were killed or wounded in the attack and that Israel was not interested in harming the understandings reached with Hizbullah during the Grapes of Wrath operation two years ago, which bar attacks on civilians on both sides.
 "This target was chosen because it was isolated and inhabited only by terrorists," said one very senior defense official. "The results were good. We haven't had such good results in a long time."
 He said he did not believe the raid would spark a retaliation, but warned Hizbullah not to escalate tensions.
 "This is a hint to other organizations that it is best to weigh their steps," he said.
 Defense officials said that the air raid was not linked with the latest Hizbullah rocket and mortar attack on IDF targets along the northern border.
 The IDF Spokesman said the Grapes of Wrath monitoring group had determined that Lebanon had breached the understandings because of mortar rounds that exploded northwest of Kibbutz Manara on Monday night.
 The five-nation committee concluded its deliberations early yesterday into five complaints by Israel and three from Lebanon.
 The statement said the monitoring group also determined that Lebanon had breached the understandings because Hizbullah had fired mortars from Majdal Salim village, north of the zone.
 The monitoring group determined that South Lebanese Army shelling towards villages in which seven civilians were wounded was in response to attacks by Lebanese on the security zone, the statement said.
 The air raid was denounced by Hizbullah, which issued a statement saying that it "shows Israel's true colors" which are not directed toward peace.
 Similar comments were expressed in the Syrian press after the heavy exchanges in the region on Monday night following Hizbullah's attacks on IDF posts.

Following stabbing death of yeshiva student

PM orders security plan for Old City

By ELLI WOHLGELER

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has ordered the police to prepare a detailed security plan for Jerusalem's Old City. The plan is to include stationary police points, which can maintain eye contact with one another, along the main thoroughfare from the Western Wall to the Damascus and Jaffa gates.

The directive follows the stabbing death last Wednesday of Ateret Cohanim yeshiva student Haim Kerman, who was killed while on his way to sunrise services at the Western Wall.

Netanyahu convened a meeting in his office late Tuesday night, hours before his departure to Washington, at the suggestion of MK Hanan Porat. Those in attendance included Porat, General Security Service head Ami Ayalon, Police Inspector-General Yehuda Wilk, Jerusalem District Police Cmdr. Yair Yitzhaki, and three representatives from Ateret Cohanim: director Matti Dan; Rabbi Avi Ronsky, a teacher at the yeshiva; and Segui Ben-Ya'acov, the school's security officer.

Ateret Cohanim presented Netanyahu with a detailed security proposal, which centered on creating a new elite unit to maintain safe-passage corridors along Haggai Street, a main north-south street, and David Street, the main souk street, both of which lead to the Western Wall.

The proposal calls for the new unit to be in eye-to-eye contact along the length of the streets, an idea that has long been promoted by Ateret Cohanim, especially when its leaders met with Netanyahu two days after the murder of student Gavriel Hirschberg on November 20.

"The main thing that we asked for is real security, in the face of the dreadful murder," said Porat. "I'm very anxious about the situation there, what's going on today. We demanded to receive answers that were far more meaningful in the face of the increased violence and the level of hostility."

At the end of the meeting, Netanyahu ordered Yitzhaki to prepare a plan and a budget this week while the prime minister was in America, which would be discussed immediately upon his return.

"I think that the prime minister understands the gravity of the situation," said Dan. "We're speaking here about freedom of access to the holy sites - it can't be that a man can't get to the Kotel; it is the basis of our hold on Jerusalem. Just like a Moslem can get to the Temple Mount area, and a Christian to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, so a Jew has to get to the Western Wall."

Dan said that he views the Old City as a homogeneous area, and that "if this sort of attack can take place in one quarter, then it can take place in another. So [boosting up the security] would also be beneficial to the Christians and Moslems."

The proposal would also rearrange the present escort system by having the yeshiva's private security personnel escort residents from the police booths, instead of from the Western Wall.

Porat said he hoped that the police will prepare their plan taking into account "in a very significant way the state of security as it today. That was our request, and that was what [Netanyahu] agreed to. I very much hope that the meeting will prove effective. The test will really come if it's put into action."

Holiday roast

Jerusalem children gather at a bonfire last night to mark Lag Ba'omer, as similar festivities were held throughout the country. At the main festivities, pilgrims gathered at Mount Meron near the tomb of the 2nd century Talmudic sage, Rabbi Shimon Bar-Yochai. By mid-afternoon around 40,000 people had already converged on Mt. Meron and by evening all parking lots in the surrounding area were full. In Safed, celebrants paraded through the streets, taking an ancient Torah from the Abu family home to Mt. Meron for the 165th consecutive year. Lag Ba'omer marks the 33rd day of the counting period (omer) between Pesach and Shavuot. A plague that devastated Torah scholars during the Roman era abated on Lag Ba'omer, according to Talmudic texts.

PA calls for orderly 'million-man' protest

By STEVE RODAN

The Palestinian Authority has called for today's "million-man march" commemorating 50 years of resistance to Israel to be orderly. It urged demonstrators not to clash with troops, but the IDF has beefed up forces to brace for violence.

PA officials stressed that its security forces will maintain order in marches throughout the territories and urged demonstrators not to be diverted from the message of unity symbolized by today's protest.

"Hassan Kashef, the coordinator of the march in Gaza, said he expects tens of thousands of Palestinians to march from Rafah and Khan Yunis north to Gaza City. Along the route, they will pass the Jewish settlements in Gush Katif and Netzarim.

"We don't want to have friction with the settlers," Kashef told Voice of Palestine radio.

Palestinian Legislative Council member and Fatah leader Abbas Zaki agreed. "There are no plans for demonstrations at IDF roadblocks," he said. "This is a day for the masses, not for unrest. If the Israelis don't try to encourage violence, there won't be any."

Abbas and other PLC members plan to lead marches of their constituencies around the territories. PA sources said the marches will provide a rare opportunity for regional and national political figures to recruit grass-roots support.

In Gaza yesterday, an estimated 1,000 Palestinians from Fatah and Hamas demonstrated against Israel. Speakers called for a renewal of the intifada uprising as protesters burned Israeli flags and effigies of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

PA officials repeatedly appealed yesterday for Palestinians to join the marches throughout the territories. They said all of the major Palestinian parties, social groups, unions, schools, and non-governmental agencies have agreed to participate.

At noon, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat is to address the marchers in a live Voice of Palestine radio broadcast. Officials said the speech will be heard from loudspeakers in mosques throughout the territories.

"This is a call for the entire world to understand that the Palestinian people will remain on their land despite all the efforts to displace them," PA Information Minister Yasser Abbed Rabbo said. "It is a message that peace won't come with settlements and all other things that world opinion condemns."

Orderly marches were held yesterday in several areas in the West Bank, including Tulkarm and the Dheisheh refugee camp outside Bethlehem.

PA officials said roads through many Palestinian cities will be closed during the march, which begins at 10 a.m. This includes all of the major arteries through Ramallah and El Bireh that reach Manara Square.

An Israeli official said today's march represents a major test of the PA's ability to maintain order. "The message that we see is that the PA wants tension," he said. "But if officials say this is not their intention then we can only judge by what happens on the ground."

PA officials hope the march will contribute to quiet efforts to reconcile with Hamas following the arrests of hundreds of Islamic activists in connection with the assassination of bombmaker Muhi Sharif. But PLC members yesterday expressed anger at the PA decision to allow the International Committee of the Red Cross to visit Hamas prisoners, while refusing to allow a special legislative committee to do the same.

"It's shameful that the Red Cross was allowed and the committee was prohibited," said PLC member Abbas Zaki, representing Hebron.

Wajih Yaghi, a Hamas-aligned legislator from Gaza, added, "We want to know who killed Sharif."

Was it Israel? We want to know the truth." But several PLC members said they are ready to disband the special committee, grant members access to the because of the PA's refusal to Hamas detainees.

IDF bars Israelis from PA areas

By ARNOLD O'SULLIVAN

The IDF has barred Israelis from entering the areas controlled by the Palestinian Authority to prevent friction as the Palestinians mark the 50th anniversary of what they call "the calamity," the creation of the State of Israel.

Over the past few days, senior IDF officials met with top Palestinian police commanders to coordinate how they would treat the demonstrations that may develop. Israel is concerned that the protests, which are expected to draw hundreds of thousands of demonstrators, may turn violent.

"We hope that the tensions there won't spill over into territory under our control," said one senior defense official.

IDF forces are being kept on alert to deal with any violence that may take place.

In a related matter, the annual memorial service for the 54 IDF personnel killed in a helicopter crash near Jericho 21 years ago is still scheduled to take place. Those interested in attending the 11 a.m. service are asked to take the Jericho bypass road to the village of Awuja and follow the signs.

PM meets Albright

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright hold talks at a Washington hotel yesterday. No progress was reported after their 90-minute session, but the State Department said they would hold another round of talks today.

INDIA

The US measures, which also restrict arms exports, cut off non-humanitarian aid, and bar private US bank loans to the Indian government, except for food, can only be repealed by an act of Congress.

But Clinton, looking to muster international support for sanctions, found no takers among his European allies. Britain, the former colonial power in India, said it has no intention of following suit.

"The government's position is that it will not impose sanctions," Prime Minister Tony Blair's official spokesman told reporters. He said he expects the G8 leaders to express dismay and condemnation.

German Chancellor Helmut Kohl, asked at a joint news conference with Clinton whether Bonn would join sanctions, said only: "We will study this very carefully."

France, deeply embarrassed by global protests over its own nuclear tests two years ago, said it disapproves of New Delhi's step but opposes US sanctions and will not impose its own.

"The French government does not encourage the Americans to pursue sanctions, because this is surely not the right method for attempting to assure that India joins those nations wishing to sign the non-proliferation treaties," government spokesman Daniel Vaillant said.

Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov told reporters in Moscow:

"I do not favor Russia introducing any kind of sanctions on any issues. We treat such measures very cautiously because sometimes they are counter-productive."

In Tokyo, the Japanese government announced a mainly symbolic suspension of grant aid to India, but left alone for the moment the bulk of its assistance in yen loans.

Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, visiting London before the G8 summit, withdrew his country's ambassador from New Delhi, banned arms exports, and said further measures would be announced following consultations with allies.

A British spokesman said the European Union would seek a joint stance when foreign ministers hold their next meeting on May 25, but he cautioned it would be unwise to expect them to enact trade sanctions.

The G8 is an informal grouping with no standing in international law.

Bomb explodes at Moscow synagogue

MOSCOW (AP) - A bomb exploded at an Orthodox synagogue in Moscow last night, just minutes after congregants had left a Lag Ba'omer celebration.

Several construction workers at an adjoining building site were injured, said Rabbi Berek Lazar, but none of the congregants was hurt.

"It was a miracle" more people weren't hurt, Lazar said. "People are outside bleeding."

The Interfax news agency reported two people injured.

The bomb had been placed in the facade of the Marinyia Roscha synagogue - the same place where a bomb exploded a year and a half ago, Lazar said. It shattered windows and caused other damage to the building, he said.

Some 70 people had been attending Lag Ba'omer services and had gone to the third floor of the building about 10 minutes before the blast.

Hanegbi presents human rights bills

Says laws would almost complete 'constitutional process'

By DAN IZENBERG

Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi yesterday formally launched his campaign to legislate three more basic human rights laws, telling coalition faction heads that the legislation would almost complete the "constitutional process" which began 50 years ago.

However, the initial comments of the representatives of Shas, United Torah Judaism and the National Religious Party made it obvious that Hanegbi would be facing an uphill battle within the coalition.

"I have the feeling that by drafting a series of basic laws, the government is trying to sneak a constitution in through the back door. I am in favor of a constitution, but we already have one," Nissan Slomiansky (NRP) said, referring to Halacha.

The three bills prepared by the Justice Ministry deal with judicial rights, freedom of expression and organization, and social rights.

In his introductory remarks, Hanegbi said that none of the bills "had anything to do with the constitutional process on matters of state and religion or the tensions between Halacha and secularism."

But his words did not reassure the Orthodox representatives. MK Avraham Ravitz (UTJ) said that he had voted for the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom and the Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation in 1992 only to find afterwards that the High Court of Justice gave it a broad interpretation "which we didn't imagine in our wildest dreams."

Ravitz added that during the discussions leading to the passage of those two bills, he had wanted to give supremacy to the Jewish character of Israel in the preamble to the laws by describing it as a "Jewish state whose system of government is democratic." Had his formulation been accepted, he continued, perhaps decisions like Supreme Court Justice Dalia Dorner's ruling in favor of homosexuals in a recent landmark case would not have been passed.

"We will approach the new bills with extreme caution and examine every single word," he declared.

MK Hanan Porat (NRP) said the bills guaranteed individual rights, but made no mention of individual obligations. For example, Articles 3 and 4 confirm the individual's right to freedom of expression and freedom of creativity.

"If the creativity leads to the depreciation of others, it must be restricted," said Porat. "If the restrictions are not included in the law, it is unbalanced."

He added that the human rights laws made no mention of the rights of the collective. For example, the Law of Return should be made into a basic law, he said.

Hanegbi, who was distinctly conciliatory, said he would meet privately with each faction in order to hammer out a formulation acceptable to all. But he said he was determined that the bills would pass.

"We will disprove the claims that this government does not have a social agenda and is not concerned with the well-being of the individual," said Hanegbi. "We can prove that our approach in these areas is one of leadership based on harmony and agreement."

HEBREW PRESS REVIEW

By ORLY AHARONI

Creative Ideas

"Why does an immediate 13% withdrawal endanger Israel's security while [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu's 'creative idea' of an 11% withdrawal now and [vacating] another 2% later not risk state security?" asks Yosef Lapid, of Ma'ariv.

He believes the answer lies in the fact that there is no logic in Netanyahu's proposal and that it is only meant to dissolve the peace process.

Yosef Harif, also writing in Ma'ariv, is convinced that Netanyahu is sincere in his proposal and that the second redeployment will take place on condition that the Palestinians carry out their side of the agreement.

"Contrary to a few of his colleagues, Netanyahu is a realist...it is obvious to Netanyahu that without a compromise between the Israeli and the American stands, it is doubtful whether the political process will continue, with all of the consequences for this in [Israel's] relations with the US, Europe, Egypt and Jordan."

Barak's bill

Labor party leader Ehud Barak's submission of a bill calling for the draft of yeshiva students this week, and the Ashkenazi Torah committee's rejection of the bill, has stirred controversy among Hebrew press commentators.

Referring to the Torah Committee's response, Arye Naor writes in Ma'ariv that it conveys the "alienation [of the haredim] from the Israeli existence, and also their rejection of Zionism and ideological reservations about the state."

Naor notes the threats raised by the haredim against Barak and predicts that "the deepening sense of revulsion throughout the public will also lead the prime minister and his party to support the drafting of yeshiva students."

Ha'aretz writes in an editorial that the new bill does not lead to total equality between the secular and religious sectors and therefore, is "not perfect. Still, it is better than the status quo."

It adds that Labor party should go one step further and demand the separation of religion from state.

"[The haredim] are starting to realize that as far as they are concerned, they can only win if they forge links with the left wing," writes Chemi Shalev in Ma'ariv. Within the right-wing there are many anti-haredim elements that together with the left can prevent any religious legislation, he adds.

"The unequivocal support of the haredim for [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu...released the left from any political inhibitions that it might have had and opened the way to an attack on the most sacred of status quos."

Amos Carmel, of Yediot Ahronot, claims that the use of 12th graders who accompanied Barak as he presented the bill, and the way he avoided details only shows that those who stand behind the proposal are image consultants and public relations figures.

He concludes that the proposal is not serious and can damage the struggle of those who are honestly concerned with the issue of equality.

Deri's trial

"Everything changes in our lives except one thing which is solid, sure and never ending: MK Arye Deri stands trial," writes Yosef Lapid in Ma'ariv.

The comment came after State Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein passed on a public indictment to the Knesset, accusing Deri of transferring money illegally to institutions associated with Shas. "The public's best interest as well as Deri's is that the trial come to an end as soon as possible," Lapid wrote.

Weizman cancels performance at inauguration

By LIAT COLLINS

Just who's calling the tune in the Knesset? The answer appears to be the president. Or at least Arye Shumer, director of Beit Hanassi.

After a day of intense discussion on whether women could or should sing at the inauguration ceremony of President Ezer Weizman in the Knesset on Monday, Shumer called Acting Speaker Meir Sheetrit and informed him that there would be no artistic performance during the ceremony and that the song which was scheduled to be performed by a male soloist from an IDF Education Corps vocal ensemble would be dropped.

Instead the only singing will be the national anthem to be sung by all the MKs and guests.

The announcement followed a debate initiated by MK Avraham Poraz (Shinui), who claimed female soldiers who are part of an Education Corps vocal ensemble had been banned from appearing at the inauguration to avoid offending the sensibilities of religious MKs. The religious MKs, however, were not involved in the decision.

Poraz said the ensemble - three women soldiers and one male soldier - had been asked by to appear at the ceremony by Beit Hanassi when it was discovered that singer Yehoram Gaon, whom Weizman admires, would be abroad.

The entire Meretz faction, and several other MKs - including Poraz, Ze'ev Boim (Likud), and several women parliamentarians - threatened to walk out if the female singers did not perform, and haredi MKs said they would have to leave during the singing if it went ahead. Tsomet whip Eliezer Zandberg started a petition in favor of the full ensemble.

Although Knesset clerk Arye Hahn said he thought the incident had been brought to a close with Weizman's decision, Dalia Itzik (Labor) still called on her colleagues to boycott the event, saying the decision had been forced "out of medieval and dark superstitions." Dedi Zucker (Meretz) also described the decision as a surrender to religious coercion.

Before the decision was announced, Ran Cohen (Meretz) sent a letter to the nine women MKs suggesting they make their voices heard during the national anthem "and if the haredi MKs want to leave the plenum, let them leave instead of us."

Earlier in the day, Weizman told reporters, "I suggested just singing 'Hatikva,' which I think would be the most dignified thing, sung by one [male] member of an IDF troupe accompanied by a [female] pianist. The rest of the singing, by the whole ensemble without changes in its composition, should be afterward at the reception. I think this is dignified. I don't think songs other than the anthem should be sung in the plenum."

In the past, choirs have appeared in the plenum, but the mixed composition was considered less problematic as the women's voices were not dominant.

Pini Badash (Tsomet), called on all the MKs to stop fanning the dispute. "The honor of the president is above all. A state ceremony cannot be allowed to become a cause for ridicule," he said.

Israel Handbook with the Palestine Authority areas
Dave Winter & John Matthews
Footprint's award

Although I haven't read every one of the 816 pages in this ISRAEL Handbook for tourists, travellers and visitors, those that I have read lead me to recommend it as a good book for all concerned.

Published by the reputable Footprint Handbooks company it deals in detail with every little facet of the Holy Land from Archaeology to Zionism.

A truly remarkable endeavour. Congratulations authors Dave Winter and John Matthews, for example Birdwatching - Israel is a superb place for bird-watching because of its location on the main migratory routes.

Waiters and waitresses - most seem to have been trained at the Basil Fawly school of charm.

Safety - there have been no specific terrorist attempts to target tourists (unlike in Egypt). High profile security measures enhance your safety.

Food - it is not quite the gourmet paradise that the tourist literature will have you believe.

Health - there are no specific health problems that you are likely to face except for too much sun and dehydration.

in brief

High Court extends deadline in conversion case

The High Court of Justice yesterday gave Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein until June 4 to reply to a petition as to why infants adopted abroad and converted at a Conservative ceremony at Kibbutz Hanaton in February 1995 should not be registered as Jews. The court also asked the attorney representing the parents, the Conservative movement and Na'amat to meet with Rabbi Haim Druckman, who heads a committee on conversion of adopted children, in an attempt to reach a solution out of court. Haim Shapiro

Conservative Jews plan Shavuot minyan at Wall

Members of the Conservative movement are again planning to hold a Shavuot morning service at the Western Wall. Last year there was a confrontation at the Wall when the police moved the Conservative worshippers after telling them they could not protect them from the haredi protesters surrounding them.

Rabbi Ehud Bandel, president of the movement said yesterday that although no official prayer was planned, hundreds of members are planning to hold the service after an all night study session. Bandel said he already has told Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani that he expects the police to protect those at the service. Haim Shapiro

Olmert fails to attend Mevasseret meeting

A meeting held last night at the Jerusalem International Convention Center to discuss the issue of annexing Mevasseret Zion to Jerusalem failed to produce any sparks when Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert failed to appear as planned.

"He doesn't dare face the people of Mevasseret," said spokeswoman Margalit Toledano.

The session, sponsored by the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, included a talk on how annexation would remove political power from the people in Mevasseret, and would produce an exodus from Jerusalem. Eli Wohlgelemer

Mayor's wife plans to run for his job

Suzanne Amor, wife of long-standing Migdal Ha'emek mayor, Likud MK Shaul Amor, has announced that she will stand for the mayoralty in the municipal elections in November. The 51-year-old mother-of-three, said she would run in place of her husband, who is not seeking reelection because of the new law which prohibits Knesset members from also holding municipal positions. David Rudge

Air Canada permitted to increase flights

Following long negotiations, the Civil Aviation Administration has granted Air Canada permission to initiate two additional flights a week. From the summer season, the airline is to have seven flights to Toronto and Montreal, instead of the present five. Haim Shapiro

Students protest 'robbing of freedom'

Students of the Bezalel Academy in Jerusalem demonstrated yesterday against what they termed "the robbing of artistic freedom" by haredi groups. The students organized a pre-dawn campaign to hang signs throughout the capital reading "separate between the sacred and dance," a reference to haredi pressures that triggered cancellation of the Batsheva Dance Company's performance at the Jubilee Bells celebration. In Kikar Shabat, in Mea Shearim, a group of residents engaged in a shouting match with the students and some threw stones at their cars. Itim

Moda'i in Rambam intensive care unit

Weizman visited former finance minister Yitzhak Moda'i and two soldiers who were wounded earlier this week in Lebanon yesterday at Haifa's Rambam Hospital.

Moda'i became ill while attending a board of governors' session at the Technion and was admitted to the intensive care unit at Rambam Hospital on Tuesday. No other details on his condition were released. Itim

Israeli woman found murdered in Cornwall

British police were investigating a nationwide hunt for a toddler after the boy's Israeli-born mother was found dead in her flat in Penzance, Cornwall, yesterday. Georgina McCarthy, 29, was discovered on the floor of the living room of her apartment. Local police said she had been the victim of a "brutal attack." Police are anxious to locate McCarthy's estranged partner, Paul Russell, 33. They believe Russell is in hiding with the couple's 18-month-old son, Adam.

A spokesperson from Devon and Cornwall police confirmed that McCarthy is an Israeli national and that her body will be flown back to Israel for burial. Mark Rivlin

Vatican calls for 'Jerusalem law'

By LISA PALMIERI-BILLIG

ROME - The Vatican is again calling for "a special status with international guarantees" for Jerusalem.

Vatican Secretary for Relations between States Msgr. Jean-Louis Tauran, also known as the Vatican's foreign minister, told the daily La Repubblica yesterday the Holy See hopes for "an end to conflict between Israelis and Palestinians... At the same time we ask the international community to assume its responsibility of conserving the holy and unique character of the Holy City."

"To achieve these goals, the Holy See continues to call for a special status with international guarantees."

This request has for many years replaced the original 1948 demand for the "internationalization" of Jerusalem, but has not been raised for some time. Tauran also repeated last month's statement regarding the possibility of the pope's visiting Israel "and the Holy Land."

"To these privileged places of faith," he said, "the pope goes as a pilgrim. He cannot go if his visit is not synonymous with peace and encounter between peoples and believers. Today this would not be so. Tomorrow? Let's hope."

He warned that "many peoples" in the Middle East are very frustrated with the peace process and such frustration could lead to "temptations of extremism" and "bear consequences going far beyond the region."

European Jewish Congress drops official over Swiss bank controversy

By MARILYN HENRY

ZURICH - Only days before Swiss President Flavio Cotti was to arrive in Israel with a European Jewish Congress official in tow, the EJC has yanked the official's credentials for suggesting that the World Jewish Congress is black-mailing Swiss banks.

Michael Kohn, the former president of the Swiss Jewish community and an executive of the EJC, was snubbed after he said in an interview with a Geneva paper yesterday that the Swiss banks agreed to negotiate for Holocaust-era claims only under threats of sanctions. He also suggested that money now takes precedence over morality in Jewish dealings with the Swiss.

In a statement from its headquarters in Paris, the EJC said it was "scandalous to pretend that the Swiss banks are subject to blackmail." Kohn, the EJC said, "has excluded himself from the organization, which will take sanctions to terminate his functions."

In Zurich, Israel Singer, the WJC's secretary-general, hinted - while refusing to name Kohn - that he had a conflict of interest, presumably because of his alleged financial ties to the banks. Kohn, now retired, was once prominent in Swiss industry and known as an "energy czar."

Kohn in fact represents a widely held view. However, it is one that has been taboo since December 1996 when then-president and economics minister Jean-Pascal Delamuraz created an uproar when he said that Jewish groups' calls for a Holocaust compensation fund amounted to "black-mail."

Cotti, who also is foreign minister, is due to meet with Palestinian Authority head Yasser Arafat tomorrow, and to be in Jerusalem on Sunday. It is the first trip to the region by a Swiss minister in 13 years, and comes only three months after ties between Bern and Jerusalem were strained when Swiss police detained a Mossad agent during a botched wiretapping operation. Singer was to address the Zurich Jewish community last night. It was his first address to Swiss Jews since the WJC began agitating for heirless, and unclaimed assets in Swiss banks in 1996.

Only two weeks ago, the Swiss Federation of Jewish Communities criticized boycott threats against Switzerland and efforts by the WJC, with the intervention of the US government, to reach a lump-sum global settlement with Swiss banks for Holocaust-era claims.

The Swiss Jews said that such a solution would distract from a series of processes that are now under way to compel Switzerland to come to terms with its war-era history.

US survivors face needs test for Holocaust fund

By MARILYN HENRY

ZURICH - Holocaust survivors in the US will be expected to face some kind of needs test to qualify for the Swiss humanitarian fund, fund officials said in Zurich yesterday, overriding an objection from American survivors.

Benjamin Meed, the head of the American Gathering of Holocaust Survivors and a member of the fund's executive, earlier this year called the Swiss fund an "entitlement" and said he would not ask survivors to prove they are needy to qualify. Instead, Meed said, any survivor who seeks payment from the humanitarian fund is entitled to it.

That raised hackles in Switzerland, where the humanitarian fund was established in March 1997 specifically to benefit needy Nazi victims. Privately there were calls for Meed to step aside if he could not abide by the fund rules, which had been established by the World Jewish Restitution Organization and Swiss officials.

American survivors are due to receive some $33 million from the fund, while those in Israel and Eastern Europe will have $59 million in each area from the fund. The fund began allocations to Jewish survivors last November and has distributed $10 million, although the fund has some $200 million available.

The American benefits are due to be allocated in about six months, a fund official said after a meeting Tuesday. Although the criteria have not been identified, fund head Rolf Bloch cited as examples those survivors who live on welfare benefits or who are ill.

No determination has yet been made on how to assess "need" among Israeli survivors, sources said.

Comptroller: Egged members earn more than hired drivers

By HAIM SHAPIRO

In a public relations campaign mounted by Egged, friendly bus drivers tell of their joy in transporting the public. But their joy in their earnings may depend on whether they are members of the cooperative or hired workers.

This was one of the elements revealed yesterday by the state comptroller's report on Egged, a report which assumes added significance because the government is openly working to create greater competition for the cooperative, which has a virtual monopoly on much of public transport.

The cooperative was the object of review by the comptroller because it receives a state subsidy in return for ensuring public transport in areas which are not profitable.

According to the report, the percentage of hired workers has continued to grow, from 48 percent at the end of 1993 to 53 percent at the end of 1996. In a sample survey, members of the cooperative made an average of 27 percent more than hired workers. Even in cases in which members and non-members had the same degree of seniority, the member's pay was considerably higher, the report said.

In its negotiations with Egged, the report said, the government must assess whether the salaries of the members are reasonable, since the cooperative has accumulated a significant deficit.

In Egged's public relations campaign, the drivers also stress that a bus ride is safe, but the comptroller revealed that the company routinely ignores regulations which were introduced to ensure that drivers did not work to the point of exhaustion. According to the regulations, drivers are not to work more than nine hours without an hour's rest, they may not work more than 12 hours out of 24, or more than 68 hours a week.

However, the cooperative's own records show that among members, 70% had no hour of rest when they worked more than nine hours, that 62% of all work days lasted more than 12 hours, that 43% of the work days were between 16 and 20 hours, and that 10% of work days were 20 to 24 hours. All of the members work more than 68 hours a week.

Among hired drivers, 70% had no rest during a work day of over nine hours, 60% of the work days lasted more than 12 hours, and 34% of the work days were 16 to 20 hours long. Almost all the hired drivers work more than 68 hours a week.

In cases where drivers are involved in accidents, a cooperative tribunal determines his responsibility, in addition to a traffic court. However, the report found that the fines imposed by Egged's tribunal are usually so low that they do not constitute a deterrent.

In response, Egged spokesman Ron Ratner said that if the criticism in the report was the only flaw in the cooperative during the five years covered, then the report constituted a certificate of honor for Egged's management. Ratner noted that the report had indicated that most of the faults had been corrected and he said that the remainder are in the process of being remedied.

MKs slam IBA coverage of 'Death to the Arabs'

Deputy Defense Minister Silvan Shalom yesterday called on the Israel Broadcasting Authority to examine whether its reporter edited a report on celebrations by Bnei Jerusalem football fans to make it seem as if Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had waved to calls of "Death to the Arabs." Shalom was answering several motions on the Saturday night incident.

He said that neither on Channel 33's live broadcast nor Channel 2's coverage could the death calls be heard. There is a theory, Shalom added, that the Israel Television reporter stood next to a small group which called the slogans into the microphone and later used this as the sound effect for the report.

Shalom and the MKs all condemned the death calls. MK Azmi Bishara (Hadash) said that even if Netanyahu did not hear the calls, he and the mayor should have denounced them as soon as they learned of them. Yesterday's murder of a Jerusalem Arab was a consequence of such incitement, he said.

Daunting Deficit

The new director-general of the IBA, Uri Porat, yesterday met with the Knesset Education Committee and told it that the authority is suffering from a NIS 60 million deficit.

Porat, who held the same position several years ago, called the IBA's current situation "worrisome" and said he had found "anarchy instead of hierarchy." He also complained that Channel 1's broadcast time is taken up by "hitchhikers" such as Educational Television.

Culture authority gets nod

The Knesset passed an array of bills in preliminary reading yesterday. Among them:

- a bill by Yona Yahav (Labor) under which a national authority for culture and the arts would be established;

- a bill by Haim Oron (Meretz) which would prevent Dudaim from becoming the major permanent landfill in the south;

- a bill by Amnon Rubinstein (Meretz) which would limit the authority of the Interior Minister to prevent the entry of tourists into the country without agreement from other relevant decision-makers such as the Defense Minister or Internal Security Minister;

- a bill by Moshe Gafni (United Torah Judaism) which would ban the publication of the names and pictures of victims of an accident, disaster or terrorist attack without their consent or the consent of their families;

- a bill by Avi Yehezkel (Labor) which would require a public referendum among local residents before towns could be annexed, such as Mevasseret Zion;

AT THE KNESSET

- a bill by MK Yael Dayan (Labor) which would reduce the "cooling off period" for senior public officials who want to enter political life. Currently, the required period is 100 days. Under the new electoral system, elections can be called and held in 60 days. Dayan suggested a 50-day period;

- a bill by Yona Yahav (Labor), Moshe Gafni (United Torah Judaism), Shaul Yahalom (National Religious Party) and Meir Sheerit (Likud) which would allow an IDF widow to keep her privileges even if she remarries;

- a bill by MK Ephraim Sneh (Labor) which would require that the basket of health services covered under the National Health Insurance Law be annually updated.

Two bills requiring compulsory primary elections in the major parties - raised by Labor MKs Ra'anana Cohen and Haim Ramon - failed by one vote. The proponents of the bills launched a scathing criticism of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom, answering on behalf of the government, said the bills were "anti-democratic."

At a meeting of the Knesset Committee on Foreign Workers yesterday an Israel Electric Company official said some 2,250 people work at the Ashkelon power plant, where laborers were killed Friday in an accident. Nine hundred and forty of the workers are foreigners employed by contractors.

When MK Tzvi Weinberg (Yisrael Ba'Aliya) implied there could be more incidents of negligence at sites employing foreign workers, Labor and Social Affairs Minister Eli Yishai (Shas) replied: "If more foreign workers are injured it's apparently because more foreign workers are employed and that's a problem we are trying to deal with now."

He added that the Ashkelon site was visited once a week by a senior ministry safety expert.

MK Ahmed Saad (Hadash) described the conditions of foreign workers in the country as "a slave market." A National Insurance Institute official said the widows of the foreign workers would receive compensation.

MK Yitzhak Cohen (Shas), who chaired the meeting, called the accident "a tragedy."

Political appointments dominate staffs of municipalities - report

By DAN IZENBERG

Six cities have handed out 84 percent of their job appointments without tenders since the last municipal elections. State Comptroller Miriam Ben-Porat wrote yesterday.

Ben-Porat investigated Bat Yam, Tel Aviv, Givatayim, Holon, Ness Ziona and Kiryat Ono from November 1993, when the current crop of mayors was elected, until the end of 1995.

According to the report, the cities handed out a total of 689 jobs during the two years that were investigated. Only 112 of the appointments were made after a tender for the job had been published.

The Comptroller also found that the cities had made 36 political appointments, including 27 without a tender. "These appointees were active in the same political frameworks as the elected mayor or a senior member of the executive," wrote Ben-Porat.

"Most of them participated in the municipal election campaign on behalf of the mayor or his faction, or the faction of some other member of the city executive." Almost all of the 21-page report is devoted to specific examples of violations of the strictures against political appointments or the laws calling for public tenders.

For example, the municipality of

Tel Aviv made six political appointments without a tender, including the position of director of the Authority for Tourism, Commerce and Industry.

The Comptroller wrote that in April 1994, the city published a tender for the post.

There were two candidates. An appointments committee, established to examine the candidates for this specific tender, chose one of them.

Ultimately, however, he was given another job in one of the municipal corporations.

In August, 1994, two months after the appointments committee had met, another man applied for the job. Six days later, the committee reconvened and chose him. There were no other candidates.

It turned out that the man was a member of the Likud Central Committee and a founder of a non-profit organization which campaigned for Mayor Roni Milo.

Eurovision comes to the Knesset

By LIAT COLLINS

A message of "Viva La Diva" went out from the Knesset yesterday when Eurovision Song Contest winner Dana International was honored at a special gathering of the Education Committee. The House, no stranger to the famous, became the scene of general excitement as MKs, parliamentary aides, and Knesset workers struggled to get a look at the country's most famous transsexual and first Israeli Eurovision winner in two decades.

Despite the fact that millions of television viewers in Europe know what the singer looks like, International faced a short delay in gaining entry to the Knesset, as she was not carrying an identity card.

When she finally entered the corridor leading to the committee room, International was greeted by a round of applause and more media attention than most MKs dream of. Knesset guards found it hard to hold back journalists and photographers, including foreign press, and groupies.

Committee chairman Emanuel Zissmann (The Third Way) thanked International for "raising national morale" and presented her, composer Zvika Pik, and songwriter Yoav Ginal with books on the Knesset.

"We see this achievement as a result not just of the song, but of your charm and charisma," Zissmann said.

Admitting to being "flattered by the attention," International replied: "This is not just a victory for me as a person, but a victory for the country, and for the image of the country, which I don't have to tell you is not the most popular in the world."

The committee members were united in their insistence that the Eurovision should take place in Jerusalem.

Since the Knesset House Rules do not allow for committee meetings to be held while the plenum is sitting, the committee met as an informal gathering.

While many MKs fought to get closer to the singer - and MK David Bolin (Likud) was so moved he composed a poem in her honor - some members of the National Religious Party and the haredi parties noticeably avoided the media event. However, International's appearance in the Knesset did raise certain questions for some of them: MK Nissan Slomiansky (NRP), for example, wondered whether International could join a minyan for prayers.

Conservative Rabbi claims Interior Ministry is snubbing American black converts

By HAIM SHAPIRO

The Interior Ministry has refused to grant automatic citizenship to members of a black family from the US who were converted by a Conservative rabbinical court, according to Rabbi Andy Sacks, an official of the Conservative movement in Jerusalem.

The family members, who arrived on Tuesday, include a man who had already come as an oleh and acquired Israeli citizenship, along with his wife, two children and four grandchildren.

After detaining the family, officials at Ben-Gurion Airport allowed them into the country on condition that everyone other than the father sign an undertaking to leave the country within 30 days and then arrange their re-entry from the US.

However, Sacks said yesterday that the family had been in contact with aliyah authorities for over a year and was unsuccessful in attaining official aliyah status.

Interior Ministry spokeswoman Tova Elinson said in response last night: "It is the right of the state of Israel to investigate anyone who wants to become a citizen," she said.

If the family was unable to make aliyah from abroad through the Jewish Agency, the JA must have had reasons for its position, she said. Their status in Israel is that of tourists. JA officials could not be reached for comment last night.

Sacks said that despite assurances from the government that all Conservative and Reform converts from abroad are accepted in Israel, there have been other cases in which the authorities have refused to recognize the rights of non-Orthodox converts. This was especially true when non-white converts were involved, he said.

Rabbis from the Conservative movement are due to meet with the family today in an effort to clarify their situation.

Trans-Israel highway start-date uncertain

By DAVID HARRIS

Construction of the Trans-Israel Highway (route 6) will begin in the fall, rather than during the summer, Cross-Israel Highway spokesman Ariel Shabtai said yesterday.

The delay is being put down to two factors: a delay in closing the finances for the project and organizational delays on the ground.

"It'll now begin in October, maybe a little later or a little sooner," Shabtai said.

This suggestion was denied only yesterday by the tender-winning Derech Eretz consortium.

"There is absolutely no delay whatsoever, we will begin work on schedule in September," said consortium general manager Ehud Savion.

The financial arrangements are in the final stages before closing and will be completed mid-August, he added.

The consortium is promising to employ 2,000 people directly, with a further 10,000 being hired by contractors and in linked work.

Total private sector investment in the project will amount to more than $1 billion, according to consortium president John Beck.

Israel Airports Authority

Public Tender No. C4010049

Energy Center Building Contract

The Israel Airports Authority (IAA) hereby requests Proposals from qualified Offerors meeting the below listed Pre-Conditions for the Construction of the Energy Center Building Construction for the Ben Gurion 2000 Project. The Work of this Contract generally includes performing and managing all structural, architectural, plumbing work, building enclosure and roofing, site development and the coordination of and with other contractors on Site.

Preliminary Mandatory Requirements: This list summarizes the Pre-Conditions for an Offeror's Proposal to be considered by the IAA. Only the complete language of the Pre-Conditions as stated in the RFP is binding. This text may be obtained by written request, submitted on company letterhead, to the PMF facsimile number stated below.

- Offeror's minimum annual revenue in each of the last three (3) years was no less than the equivalent of Eighteen Million U.S. Dollars ($18 million).
- Offeror's records must indicate, for each of the last three (3) years, the cost paid directly for labor for at least two hundred (200) persons (annual average).
- Offeror has constructed and completed a minimum of either:
 - Two (2) projects of 20,000 square meters in size, each within the last five (5) years; or
 - At least one (1) 20,000 square meter project and at least two (2) electro-mechanical system projects, each of not less than 4,500 square meters in area, or the equivalent of six million US dollars ($6 million), all within the last five (5) years.
 All projects and/or systems exclude residential, warehouse and parking facilities.
- If an Israeli entity, Offeror shall be registered in the State of Israel Contractors Register under Group C, Branch 100, Type 5 (Unlimited).
- Offeror shall meet the staffing and personnel experience requirements in the RFP, Exhibit A.
- Offeror shall meet the registration requirements for a legal entity stated in the RFP, Exhibit A.
- Offeror shall meet the VAT and Israel Tax Authorities' registration requirements stated in the RFP, Exhibit A.
- Offeror shall provide an unconditional Bank Guarantee in the amount of Two (2) million New Israeli Shekels (NIS), valid for a minimum of ninety (90) days from the Proposal Submission Date, as specified in the RFP, Exhibit E.
- Joint Ventures are allowed to participate in the Tender in accordance with the conditions stated in the RFP, Part B, Section 2 and Exhibit A.
- Offeror, if a foreign entity, shall additionally provide a Commercial Cooperation Undertaking Agreement.

Additional Preliminary Requirements:

Participation in the Tender Process is subject to the Offeror's satisfying all Preliminary Requirements as detailed in the Mandatory Tender Regulations (1993), Clause 6 (a), (1), (2) and (3).

Proposal Documents: Tender Documents may be purchased until the Proposal Submission Date for the non-refundable amount of Thirteen Thousand New Israeli Shekels (13,000 NIS), including VAT.

Tender Documents are available from the Project Management Firm (PMF) Project Office located at Ben Gurion International Airport, starting May 14, 1998 between the hours of 9:00 and 12:00, business days (Sunday through Thursday). Interested Offerors must contact the PMF Contracts Administrator, Mr. Zvi Peretz Cohen at 972-3-977-4466 (fax: 972-3-971-2555) a minimum of forty eight (48) hours in advance to arrange Site access. Interested parties may preview the Tender Documents prior to their purchase.

All qualifying Proposals shall be delivered in sealed envelopes/packages not later than 10:00 hours local time on or before June 16, 1998 to the appropriate tender box located in the Archive of the Airports Authority, Main Office, 2nd Floor, Room No. 113, Ben Gurion International Airport, Israel.

A Pre-Proposal conference will be held at the Ben Gurion 2000 Project Site Offices on May 27, 1998 at 12:00 to clarify provisions in the RFP documents, to summarize and present the Project and to respond to written questions posed by Offerors. Offerors are strongly encouraged to attend, but participation is not mandatory. Site access must be arranged in advance as stated in the RFP.

The IAA is not bound to accept the lowest Proposal or any Proposal whatsoever.

Guess who's into family planning?

Iran has become an unlikely model for population control

By ROBIN WRIGHT

TEHRAN, Iran — Jalal Shahpasand, a tall, husky restaurateur, waited until after dinner and the chaperons had gone off to watch television.

After courting "the lovely Jila" for a year, he was ready. So he took her hand and softly asked, "Will you marry me?"

Jila nodded.

Javad Goudarzi, a handsome plastics worker with a thick mustache, chose the traditional route to marriage: family arrangement.

When he met 19-year-old Theahereh the first time, he decided that she was the girl for him. A week later, the proposal was relayed from his parents to her aunt and then to Theahereh. Back through the same route, she accepted.

And so the two couples ended up in a whitewashed health-clinic classroom last week, waiting for something even more important in Iran than a marriage license — a slip certifying that they had passed the nation's family planning course.

No one gets married without it. The course is just one aspect of an ambitious campaign to stop what had become one of the world's biggest population surges — one that had almost doubled the number of Iranians since the 1979 Islamic Revolution from 34 million to 63 million today.

The numbers shot up after the new religious government in the late '70s urged Iranian women to breed an Islamic generation. Aided by a lowering of the marriage age to 9, they more than complied.

By the early 1980s, the population growth rate had reached 3.2 percent, according to Iran's Health Ministry. International agencies pegged the rate at up to 3.9%, among the world's highest.

Either way, the government — aware of the costs of such a large population — is spending millions of dollars a generation later to reverse the trend.

It seems to be working.

When the instructor asked how many children each couple plans to have, Jalal and Jila, who together have seven siblings, said, "One."

Javad and Theahereh, who have 13 siblings, said, "Two."

Nationwide, the population growth rate is now down to 1.41%, Iran says. And the fertility rate has dropped to such a staggering number that wary demographic experts are helping to expand the data base and sampling techniques.

Nonetheless, Iran's campaign has won worldwide praise.

Population groups cite it as a model for developing nations and the Islamic bloc.

And Washington-based Population Action International bestowed its highest commendation on Iran's program.

Its strength may be its imaginative initiatives.

Abbas Farsi, a diminutive truck driver with the first strands of silver in his hair, showed up early at the No-Scalpel Vasectomy clinic in south Tehran last week for the 10-minute procedure — and the 30-minute video showing a vasectomy and answering the most-asked questions, plus personal counseling.

"We have two children, and we want to give them a good education, so it was time to make sure we didn't have any more," he said. Farsi's procedure was one of about 3,500 each year at the facility, which in turn is one of dozens of permanent and mobile clinics in Iran. All are free.

From Norplant to condoms, IUDs to the pill and including both male and female sterilization, birth-control products are free to all takers in another aspect of Iran's program.

In the process, sex has come off the list of taboo subjects in the Islamic Republic.

In health rooms set up in all factories, in schoolrooms, in mosques during Population Week in July, in widespread media coverage and in a blanket advertising campaign that includes billboards and water towers, family planning is discussed widely.

The ruling clerics have even issued "fatwas," or religious edicts, approving it.

The family planning program, often referred to as Tehran's "other revolution," coincided with the end of the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq War and with broader societal openings as the revolution began to settle down.

It also represented a new streak of pragmatism among the country's Shiite Moslem clergy.

Aware that even with its oil wealth Iran would soon not be able to feed, clothe, house, educate and employ the burgeoning numbers, religious leaders, health experts, government officials and academics held a summit to figure out what to do.

Simply providing birth control was not enough, they agreed.

By 1990, the Fertility Regulation Council was established. By 1993, new laws withdrew food coupons and subsidized health insurance after the third child. And then came the array of programs which, unlike India's sometimes coercive tactics, are user-friendly, outside experts say.

Iranian youngsters last week play in Chitgar Park, Tehran, under a huge painting persuading women to keep the veil and observe Islamic behavior. Marriage candidates must pass a family planning course. (AP)

The two-hour prenuptial class was one of the first steps in 1994. "At first we used the trick of requiring couples to take the course," said Safieh Shahriari, a female gynecologist and senior family planning expert in the Health Ministry. "But after a year or two, we found most couples wanted to take the course. It's a place to ask questions at exactly the time they need answers."

In the clinic classroom, instructor Abol Faz Mohajeri offered "no-nonsense guidance."

"What's the goal of getting married?" he asked the betrothed couples.

The answers varied from having an independent life and completing the human experience to fulfilling the prophet Mohammed's message.

"Yes," said Mohajeri, adding what the others won't say: "But it's also about having regular sex."

He then explained the various environmental consequences of overpopulation and did an explicit show-and-tell of birth-control devices.

"And what do you want from God?" he continued. Jila responded that she wants healthy children. "Yes, that's right. It's not important whether it's a boy or girl," he offered.

Iran's program has emphasized gender equality to prevent the problem of male preference found elsewhere in Asia.

Despite Iran's marriage age, which family planning experts here want to return to 15, the program also stresses that pregnancy before age 20 is not recommended. An accompanying pamphlet shows caricatures of a young teenager and an old woman at full term.

To reach workers, who have the lowest participation in family planning, the Islamic Republic has set up education workshops in factory health rooms, which are also distribution centers for free contraceptives.

Nationwide, Iran holds its annual Population Week, which coincides with the UN-designated Population Day on July 11. All segments of society are engaged.

"We ask religious leaders to tell people when they are praying about the effectiveness of population control in dealing with social and economic development," Shahriari said. "Other Islamic countries are often surprised at how the religious leaders support us."

During the week, elementary through high schools focus on population issues in environmental classes developed jointly by the Health and Education ministries. To encourage media coverage, Iran's program offers free trips for the largely Tehran-based media to Isfahan and Shiraz, the historic centers of famed Iranian poetry, art and architecture, to cover family planning activities.

Year-round, Iran also recruits female volunteers who act as neighborhood advisers about family health and planning techniques.

"If neighbors are just starting a new life, a volunteer tells them about nutrition, cancer screening and care. For a family with four children, she might tell them about vasectomy and the benefits of population control," Shahriari added.

To reach remote mountain villages and rural tribal areas, Iran has 80 mobile teams, which have evolved from health workers who consulted on contraceptives to medical units — surgeons, anesthesiologists, lab technicians and nurses — that now travel by four-wheel-drive vehicles or helicopters to perform vasectomies or tubal ligation.

As a Moslem country, Iran has had some unusual problems to deal with along the way.

"Norplant, for example, can cause some bleeding, and Moslem women can't pray when they're bleeding. So people don't like it," Shahriari noted.

And the system still has serious glitches.

Despite pervasive family planning options, about 33% of pregnancies are still unwanted, by age or both partners, a recent government survey shows. And among unwanted pregnancies, 35% of the women take oral contraceptives, indicating that they are misused or not understood.

But even success does not eliminate the dangers. Even if the government meets its objectives, Iran's population is still projected to reach 90 million in less than 25 years. (LA Times)

Flashing the paparazzi out of the picture

By MARK EGAN

LONG BEACH, Calif. — Paparazzi beware, your days may be numbered. Joe Resnick hopes to beat you at your own game with an invention that will make celebrities' faces disappear like magic from unwanted photographs.

Resnick was just one of many hopeful inventors seeking investors and manufacturers for their amazing, and sometimes eccentric, products at the recent Invention Convention at the converted cruise ship Queen Mary in Long Beach.

Sitting at his booth, Resnick is wearing a Chicago Bulls cap. But this is no ordinary cap. The "O" in Chicago does not look quite right. Closer inspection reveals a small electronic device sticking through the letter — the Paparazzi Stopper.

"This is designed to thwart the efforts of a would-be photographer," Resnick said. "If you approach me and try to take my picture with a flash camera without my permission, this will stop you from taking my picture."

Concealed in the cap is a light sensor that detects the approaching light from a camera flash and sends a flash back at the camera, ruining the negative. When the picture is developed, the celebrity appears to have a huge light bulb for a head.

Resnick said he was inspired to invent his device by actor George Clooney's impassioned plea to photographers to respect celebrities' privacy after the death of Princess Diana.

"My wife and I were watching an interview with George Clooney," Resnick said. "He was saying, 'I don't want to be photographed.'"

The signals coming from Jerusalem did not bear good tidings for the administration. AIPAC's annual convention is American Jewry's principal show of strength. White House officials realized that the pact between a Netanyahu under pressure and the strong Jewish lobby, which is constantly searching for a new challenge, might well put relations between the two countries on a collision course.

When Clinton instructed Albright to remain in Washington and meet with Netanyahu, the State Department formulated an emergency plan aimed at preempting the Israeli propaganda attack. On Monday evening, Albright requested that a meeting be hastily organized with Jewish leaders, headed by Howard Koor of AIPAC.

They were summoned to a Tuesday morning meeting with her at which she described in great detail how the US had already gone the "extra mile" toward Netanyahu, and how she had been disappointed time and time again by his stance and method of operation.

"We are not looking for confrontation, but we, too, have fundamental regional interests which cannot be brushed aside," she said. "The American interest is a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace, based on UN Resolutions 242 and 338 and on the principle of 'land for peace.'"

"We are not laying down an ultimatum, nor are we threatening to harm Israel's security or relative advantage. All in all, we sounded the bell and asked the sides to wake up and get the process rolling."

She spoke in a similar vein at the press conference. She devoted four hours to the congressmen on Capitol Hill and the discussion, in which peace team coordinator Dennis Ross also participated, was frank and held in a relaxed atmosphere.

Albright's tone was conciliatory, almost apologetic: "We have done everything possible to satisfy Netanyahu, made every effort to cope with his anxieties. We have tried to reduce the risks in every way, but... there are two partners to these negotiations. We cannot afford to lose the confidence of one side."

Lunching and learning

A couple of days ago I had lunch at a restaurant close to Capitol Hill which serves as a rendezvous for senior congressmen, administration officials, and the various American lobbies. I sat with a key Jewish activist who is an expert in the secrets of Washington's corridors of power.

"Here you can see a cross-section of congressional leaders," he said. "The Middle East peace process is of no interest to them whatsoever. America is in the midst of an economic boom of unprecedented proportions. The main topic of conversation is Clinton's chances of survival and Al Gore's chances of taking over from him, not who is going to impose a solution on Israel."

The main issue this week is India's nuclear tests. That is definitely a threat to world peace. They can't take the drama surrounding the precise scale of the redeployment seriously, when everything in Asia is in a state of collapse."

"Instead of holding a press conference on the nuclear risk, everyone here is busy with Bibi. No one will buy it anymore. If congressmen are interested in what's happening in Jerusalem, it has nothing to do with the redeployment, only with political gossip."

"The conflict between Ariel Sharon and Benjamin Netanyahu is interesting. That's what they want to know about. The Jews are staunch Likud supporters and one of Netanyahu's keenest fans. "He'll turn out to be the strongest prime minister ever. Even greater than [Menachem] Begin," he said.

His enthusiasm is based mainly on the determination displayed by the prime minister on his return from London. If he had returned after succumbing to American pressure, Moshe would probably have been less vocal in support and less convinced of his success. Moshe likes heroes and anyone who stands up to American pressure is, in his view, a hero.

"Will he attend Monday's summit meeting with Clinton?" we asked.

"Don't be silly. He'd be mad to go. He has the support of everyone. They wouldn't dare force his hand."

You might not get brilliant political analysis from Moshe, but it's definitely the place to get the feel of things.

Trust and a lack of confidence

The discussions on the scale of the redeployment got off on the wrong foot. The Israelis mentioned a low two-digit figure, meaning 10 percent. The Americans were referring to a low-teen number. But the teens begin with 13, not with 11 or 12.

Slowly but surely this misunderstanding developed into a crisis of confidence. The Americans claim that Netanyahu did not specify these figures in his talks with Albright, Ross, Martin Indyk, or Ambassador Ned Walker.

Netanyahu stood his ground with them. Later, they heard from UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan that Netanyahu was willing to compromise at 11%. They claim that this is also what he said to British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

They feel deceived, as the process has been dragged out from one meeting to the next. Ever since the Hebron Agreement was signed 18 months ago, Netanyahu has rejected every effort to make progress, such as Al Gore's proposal to settle the issue of the third of the Land of Israel to Palestinian sovereignty, particularly one with Netanyahu's ideological background. It also has difficulty in coming to terms with his coalition predicament.

A miffed Sharon

Some time ago officials in Washington formed the opinion that Ariel Sharon would be willing to compromise in return for American legitimacy. A senior administration official told me this week that Sharon after the Lebanon War reminded him of Moshe Dayan after the Yom Kippur War. The Americans believed that in return for the Foreign Ministry, for example, Sharon would be prepared to turn a blind eye to the size of the redeployment.

Last week, Sharon left for a visit to the US and during the week pushed Netanyahu not to give in to the harsh American pressure. On Monday morning, he received several phone calls from Israel about leaks from the Prime Minister's Office to the effect that his support for concessions was conditional on being appointed foreign minister. He was furious. The last time Netanyahu had spoken to him about the Foreign Affairs portfolio was before the Knesset elections.

Now, in his absence, his name was being mentioned again, this time in an effort to damage his reputation.

On Tuesday, after the fiasco had died down, Netanyahu invited him to accompany him to a meeting with Albright. Sharon felt cheated once again. For weeks, the size of the redeployment has not merited serious discussion, and now he was being asked to get to the Israeli Embassy in Washington at 11 for consultations?

However, the time allocated for the talks was too short to allow the considerations to be discussed properly and still make it to the State Department in time.

Arik believes that he is too large a fish to cover up the embarrassment of American pressure and he therefore decided to remain in New York.

redeployment in the event that the negotiations on the permanent settlement reach deadlock.

The Americans seem unaware that Netanyahu, too, has had cause to lose faith in the Americans due to their open support of Shimon Peres before the elections, and because of the support they have shown for the Palestinians, despite their refusal to fulfill their part of the agreement.

Against the background of Hillary Clinton's recent comments on the subject of establishing a Palestinian state, without having fully exhausted the peace process, Washington still has difficulty understanding the emotional difficulty facing any Israeli leader in transferring territory which is part

Down and out in Jakarta

By DAVID LAMB

JAKARTA, Indonesia — On a good day, Jaeni Nurdin can take home 30,000 rupiahs — about $3 — driving his three-wheel motor-cycle taxi.

But Sunday was a bad day. He braked to a noisy halt outside the one-room house he rents in a crowded alley and put a 10,000-rupiah note in his wife's hand.

"Not enough to buy food," she said.

"I know," he replied. "But it will have to do."

He paused for a moment and added: "The students are right. Times have never been worse. They can demonstrate. And us, the poor? We can do nothing. No one hears us."

Ten miles away, in a wealthy south Jakarta neighborhood, classical music and sunshine filled the two-story, skylighted home of Julia Suryakusuma, a well-known feminist and writer. She has always thought of the written word as her weapon and never imagined herself protesting in the streets.

But not long ago, there she was, with 40 other women representing The Voice of Concerned Mothers, marching and shouting. Several were arrested.

It was, she recalled with a touch of warrior's pride, "the first time women ever hit the streets in Indonesia, and a lot of people found it inspiring."

"Our patience is wearing thin after 30 years of repression," she said. "We've ended up with a monarchy of unspeakable corruption. It's an ironic situation. With the depreciation of the rupiah, we've become one of the world's poorest countries, and our president remains one of the world's richest men."

An impoverished taxi driver, an affluent writer, both dissatisfied with the country's leader, Suharto — they are but two in a cast of 200 million who face an uncertain future as once-prosperous Indonesia lurches from economic crisis to political crisis, still haunted by the events of 33 years ago when 500,000 of their countrymen died in a transfer of power.

Indonesia has changed presidents only once in 52 years. That was in 1965, when Suharto swept away the Communist Party and Indonesia's founding father, Sukarno, amid a witch hunt for leftists, real and imagined, that resulted in one of the bloodiest chapters in the modern history of Southeast Asia.

While the country enjoyed steady growth and impressive development through most of the 1990s, Indonesians tolerated — or at least did not dare question — Suharto's authoritarian, corrupt, nepotistic rule, which brooked no opposition.

But public opinion began turning against him last fall, when the economy crashed in Asia's economic crisis, and today it is so critical that it is hard to find anyone outside his own inner circle who supports him.

Even taxi driver Nurdin, contemplating the student protests that have dragged on for three months, said, "I've never done anything like that, but if things don't get better..." and his voice trailed off.

On Sunday morning, two graduate students, Sangkalo and Abdul, both leading organizers of the growing movement that is challenging Suharto's regime, met in the courtyard of the University of Indonesia's Salemba campus. They had already exchanged information with other student dissidents throughout the country on the Internet.

"First, we are trying to avoid a clash with the security forces," said Sangkalo. "Violence is not our goal. We want a free and open government, and I think people are starting to hear our voice. Reform is still possible within the system."

Suharto in Cairo this week. Many Indonesians have lost the fear to openly attack the longtime autocrat.

"In the weeks ahead," Abdul said, "we want all the universities — students and teachers — to speak with one voice. We want to broaden our support to include the middle class, the working class.

Eventually, I think even ARBI (the military) will join us because soldiers are ordinary people whose families are suffering too."

The students are portraying themselves as a moral force challenging the injustices of the regime.

So far, the Indonesian middle class and other groups have not taken to the streets in large numbers in support of the students, and "people power" remains little more than a popular but misused slogan.

As in most Asian countries, obedience to authority, along with a fear of the military, still runs deep.

To all outward appearances, despite the protests — some of which have involved violence — Indonesia is not a country teetering on the brink of revolution. Life is for the most part normal in Jakarta, the capital, where on Sunday the streets were crowded, youths played soccer in Senayan Square, and a vocalist backed by a four-piece combo entertained shoppers at the Plaza Mall.

But beneath the surface, a growing clamor from every quarter for political change has made "reform" a buzzword.

Reform, however, means something different to every group. To the students, it means democracy and restructuring society. To the Cabinet, made up of Suharto's cronies, it means tinkering with a few laws. And to Suharto himself, it means uttering platitudes but maintaining the status quo.

"It is quite evident Suharto is not getting the message," said Jeffrey Winters, an expert on Indonesian affairs at Northwestern University. "He is surrounded by yes men, and he is getting a very distorted sense of the rapidly changing conditions around him."

Most political analysts believe that the current standoff between the regime and the people could continue for months.

Few dare predict the future, though the role of the 420,000-member military will be critical in determining what may well be the last chapter of the 76-year-old Suharto's presidency.

What seems certain is that Indonesia, where people now equate their misfortune with government mismanagement, is at a crossroads and that the legacy of Suharto — a one-time bank clerk and former general who amassed one of the world's great fortunes — will be forever tarnished.

Cameos of life in the East End

THE HACKNEY CRUCIBLE by Morris Beckman. Valentine Mitchell 1996. 201 pp.

By Mattityahu Admoni

I AM a non-conformist. I grew up in the post-war Anglo-Jewish society of West London in the 1950s. When most of the other Jewish boys at my non-Jewish grammar school were prepared to play rugby for the school teams on Saturday, I preferred to stay at home and go to the Shabbat services in our local synagogue. This did not make me very popular with my sports teacher because, being taller and more muscular than most of my colleagues, I had the natural build of a frontline forward in the scrum and could sprint fairly well. When my fellow grammar schoolboys were being "clever" and began smoking, at the age of 11 or 12, I was super "clever" - I rejected the idea. Similarly when many of my teenage school companions preferred going out on dates, I stayed at home and, for hours, would find great satisfaction, and fascination, staring down a microscope at the myriads of microorganisms present in a tiny drop of pond water. That does not mean that I did not associate with members of the opposite sex. I did, but that was not the be-all and end-all of my teenage life, as it was to many of my Jewish friends and acquaintances. I far preferred going to meetings of the religious Bnei Akiva youth movement, rather than going to the non-religious Habonim movement, or to parties, though I had my share of these also.

Something kept on telling me that Jewish values and tradition were still worth preserving in a world that seemed all too eager to throw off the shackles of religion after the tragedy of six years of world war and a Jewish Holocaust. I was witnessing the steady erosion of traditional Jewish life and practice in England in the name of modernity. Even as a youth, somehow, it bothered me. By all accounts, I should have succumbed, like most of my contemporaries, to the non-Jewish grammar school. Yet somehow I was different. I remained Orthodox despite some minor lapses, as they seemed at the time, in my early youth, i.e., before becoming bar mitzva, I actually listening to the radio on Shabbat afternoon while my parents were sleeping, it happened that I ate sweets without first checking if they were kosher.

Nevertheless I regarded myself as a member of the Orthodox community and preferred it that way. Whereas, today, I might be shocked by such behavior, as a youth growing up within the Anglo-Jewish system such ambivalence did not seem to bother me. As one of my secular primary school co-religionists once told me (I was about seven years old, at the time), I was "frum" and that made me different from most! I suppose it was inevitable that I should eventually end up living in Israel as a modern religious Zionist instead of conforming to the English way of life.

Reading The Hackney Crucible by Morris Beckman, hundreds of incidents, long forgotten in the deep recesses of my memory, came flooding back as I saw myself re-identifying with many of the places and characters he describes in his East London home. His description of their home in Amhurst Road was almost a carbon copy of the home where my mother grew up in North London's Cazenove Road. I could see my "Zeida" (grandfather) sitting in the downstairs parlor as master of the house while "Booba" (grandmother) worked in the scullery with her daughters. I recalled the front and back gardens of their large multi-story house where they grew fruit and vegetables and kept chickens.

Being born in 1940, I was spared the pre-war antisemitic activities of Sir Oswald Mosley's fascist Union Movement in East London but I often heard that name mentioned after the war, as I was growing up, until he was finally stopped by public pressure. Beckman describes this period most vividly, when he, his brothers and his friends would hide behind the garden hedges to avoid being beaten up by the blackshirts fascist youth rampaging after one of their many rallies. The "Battle of Cable Street" showed just what could be achieved if good people, Jew and non-Jew, alike were prepared to take a stand against evil pre-war Nazi propaganda.

There are many delightful cameos of Jewish life in London's East End before the great immigration from North and East London to the "posher" suburbs of N.W. London: Golden Green, Hendon, Hampstead Garden Suburbs etc. to a "better" more affluent life for the first generation English-born children of Eastern European immigrants. As Beckman states, "British-born Jews were busily climbing upwards and outwards in every direction." I was moved by his ambivalence in wanting to become like the English and throw off all Jewish ritual, on the one hand, yet, at the same time, insisting on sitting beside his mother's death-bed, according to Jewish custom, (instead of hiring special "watchers" until her burial), on the other. Unlike many of his contemporaries, he describes how he continued going to Shabbat morning synagogue services, despite finding them boring and repetitious but could not wait for the service to end so he could get to a football match.

I particularly liked the description of the rabbi cutting short his Shabbat sermon because he knew his "flock" were anxious not to be late for an important local soccer derby! In contrast he describes the rabbi, who taught him to read his bar-mitzva Torah portion, as "a sad man, dull and humorless, a reflection of his lifestyle."

Beckman is quite forthright in his description of the changing attitudes to sexual behavior amongst first generation English-born Jewish youth. I could sympathize with his account of how immigrant fathers and mothers differed in their attitudes to intermarriage when I recalled how my mother supported her brother when one of his children "married out" while the rest of the family disowned him.

Like most of his generation, Beckman recalls how his family kept, and contributed regularly to the "Blue Box" of the Jewish National Fund for buying land in Palestine, but they failed to heed the advice of Issy, one of his childhood friends who stated, after witnessing a blackshirt rally, "Save your fire for the only solution, Zionism..."

Reading his book brought back many vivid memories of my early life in England. The rapid erosion of a traditional Orthodox Jewish life, within one generation, that Beckman describes, in favor of the "flesh pots" of England, was the same experience I witnessed as a youth. I non-conformed and moved with my family to Israel. Morris Beckman stayed in Britain, like the majority of the people I grew up with in West London.

As a social history of an important section of London's Jewish community in the 1930s it is a compelling book that will stir up many reminders of an age gone-by where Judaism was at a crossroads and a few knew where to turn or how to retain their Jewish values, if they even wanted to, in the face of a growing antisemitism which refused to allow them to forget their origins. It is sad, in the light of later developments from 1948 onwards, that his friend, Issy, had the solution all the time, but, in those troubled days, very few, in England, or the Diaspora as a whole, were prepared to listen.

Mattityahu Admoni was born in 1940 during the London "Blitz." Educated in England as a scientist, he has lived with his family in Israel since 1969 and now spends much of his time writing and lecturing on the Jewish language, history, science and philosophy.

Granny, get your fun

GRANDMA WORKS AT NIGHT: A DARING NOVEL OF MODERN TIMES by Judith Weber. Artmedia Books. 238 pp. Price not stated.

By Esther Hecht

IT'S pretty audacious for a 75-year-old grandmother to invite her family to her new mansion for the weekend and announce that over the past 15 years she's made a fortune by providing erotic conversations on an international party line.

Even more audacious, though, is a 74-year-old grandmother building her first novel around it. Judith Weber, who grew up in Paris and lives in Tel Aviv, writes for French and English publications here, including The Jerusalem Post. Probably, like her heroine, she had to learn a whole new vocabulary for this latest undertaking. The "daring" in the subtitle no doubt reflects her sense of adventure in this verbal wonderland.

But those pyrotechnics, and how Juliet Hamilton's children and grandchildren react to granny's revelation, are only part of the story. It's an eye-opener for anyone who has ever tut-tutted about "dirty phone lines." Weber lights fires under notions of respectability, age, love, sex and loneliness and lets them come to a boil.

Improbable as the story is, it's strong enough to keep the pages turning - and this despite the less than felicitous editing. The even more improbable ending should inspire anyone who works with the elderly. But this novel is really a comedy screaming to be staged. Local theater groups could have a ball with it.

BOOK BYTES

EDWARD BALL'S late father, an Episcopalian priest, was always reluctant to talk about family history. "The Negroes," he once told his son, "are among the topics we don't talk about." The dynastic Ball family of South Carolina rice planters owned some 4,000 slaves between 1698 and the year the American Civil War ended - 1865.

Ed Ball's soul-searching account Slaves in the Family (Farrar, Straus & Giroux) has taken the wraps off his family's secret and, at times, less than benevolent past.

Miscegenation or interracial breeding, beatings and hangings were features of slave life that the Ball family indulged in during its slave-owning past. Ball's research, which began in 1994, was greatly aided by his ancestors' meticulous record-keeping. The author also visited Sierra Leone to seek out black slave dealers.

At the coming of the millennium, Ball estimates that between 75-100,000 living descendants of the original 4,000 slaves will be scattered around the US. Many carry Ball blood in their veins.

Defying his father's dictum, Ball confronts the fact that "The progeny of slaves and progeny of slave owners are forever linked."

"I WAS a reporter on the Express (newspaper), and I joined a group of animal-rights activists in South London," says Eileen MacDonald, whose second novel The Infiltrator (Simon & Schuster) is a medical thriller loosely based on her own experiences as an investigative journalist. However, MacDonald is quick to stress that she is not the heroine of her own book, who happens to be none other than an undercover reporter. "I haven't got long dark hair, and don't have very long legs!"

The starting point for the book is a search for a cure to Duchenne's Muscular Dystrophy (DMD), a disease which some medical researchers believe is genetically curable. For someone who has "always been afraid of science," the author met some "great scientists who were terribly excited at what they were doing," and interviewed a 12-year old boy with Duchenne's disease, which was "quite harrowing."

Her book looks into a future of "designer" babies, and draws a rather grim picture of genetic science.

A PRIZE-WINNING novelist of nine books, David Caute, is having to self-publish his tenth work, because he claims that British publishers are "too afraid to touch it."

The book was turned down by 25 publishers. Patina's Scarf (Tenderloin) grapples with the thorny issue of Islamic fundamentalism. One of the thumbs-down publishers (who preferred his name not be mentioned) said that the book was not accepted, because "it really wasn't that good."

However, author Hilary Mantel, who read and liked the book, said she thought it was rejected purely on the grounds of the publishers' "political and intellectual timidity."

GEORGE SALMOND is a professor of molecular microbiology at Cambridge University. Under his entry in Who's Who, he listed among his recreations, daily avoidance of assorted professional beggars, alcoholics and deranged individuals in the streets of Cambridge.

His ill-considered quip aroused the ire of Ruth Wyner, director of a charity for the homeless. "Homelessness is not funny," she said. "It is literally a matter of life and death."

THE 1997 Book of the Year Award went to Helen Fielding for Bridget Jones's Diary (Viking). The author commented, "Last time I was given an award was for Bible reading and I think all I said then was: 'Thank you, Jesus.'"

MYSTERY NOVELIST Chaz Brenchley and sci-fi writer Gwyneath Jones will be speaking at the British Council Garden, 3 Shimshon St., Baka, Jerusalem, this evening at 8 p.m. For details call 02-673-6733. Dress warmly. No admission charge.

In from the cold

It took 13 years, but on Monday the government finally admitted what everyone knew anyway: Jonathan Pollard was an authorized Israeli agent and not a volunteer in a rogue operation. That act should be the first step in a process of moving away from the denials and obfuscations of the past decade, dealing with the matter in an honest and forthright manner, and finally winning Jonathan Pollard's release from prison. If the government now handles the issue properly, his release might be not far off.

The damage caused by the Pollard Affair has been extraordinarily heavy. Not that friendly nations and allies do not spy on each other — on the contrary, although few will admit it, such activity is almost expected. In many cases, when spies in friendly countries are caught, the matter does not even come to the attention of the media. The nations involved usually prefer to deal with it confidentially between themselves, coming to an arrangement while quietly expelling the foreign agents involved. What made the Pollard Affair different was the recruitment of an American Jew to provide Israel with highly classified documents stolen directly from the intelligence department of the US Navy, where Pollard was employed as a civilian analyst. Such an action struck a raw nerve in the US and in the American Jewish community because it touched upon the old smear that Jews are prone to dual loyalties and cannot be trusted in sensitive positions in government or the military. The potential harm to the career advancement of many Jews in America from the substantiation of such allegations due to Israeli actions, and the anger this caused among the American Jewish leadership, is not something any Israeli government can afford to ignore.

While the recruitment and handling of Pollard was stupid and damaging in the first place, the subsequent behavior of Israel after his exposure was dismaying as well. Pollard served as an Israeli agent directed by persons who held top positions in the Scientific Liaison Office, a clandestine official unit operating under the auspices of senior government ministers. It is difficult to believe that the information Pollard supplied, which included highly coveted secret satellite photographs that the US had refused to give Israel, was not noted by top-ranking intelligence officers who knew of its source. Nevertheless, Israel treated Pollard as if he were a private individual who had volunteered information on an ad hoc basis from the moment that Pollard, with the FBI closing in on him, was denied entry into the Israeli Embassy in Washington.

The public position that the most senior government ministers — including Yitzhak Shamir, Moshe Arens, Yitzhak Rabin, and Shimon Peres — chose to adopt was that Israel bore no direct responsibility for the affair, even as they quietly paid for Pollard's legal defense and sent intermediaries to Washington to push for his release. The tactic they selected was based on the assumption that winning Pollard's release required subtle diplomatic actions that would not be perceived as provocative by the US administration. Pollard was never officially admitted to have been an Israeli agent and appeals for his release were consistently presented in humanitarian terms.

Those efforts, over 13 years, did not succeed in obtaining Pollard's release. There are now indications that a different approach might be in order. Subsequent US administrations have treated the Pollard Affair as the extremely serious act of an American traitor. Until now, the Clinton administration has refused to even consider any of Israel's appeals for Pollard's release, while the highly covered parade of Israeli politicians visiting Pollard in prison only made matters worse. The White House and the American intelligence community have consistently insisted that ending the affair first required a clear statement of Israeli responsibility and full cooperation in examining what intelligence documents Pollard handed over to Israel.

Now that the government has officially acknowledged Pollard's role as an agent of Israel, the US and Israel can deal with the matter as two friendly governments working to repair intelligence relations that were damaged by a spy affair. The US reportedly has a long list of demands, including the return of all the documents Pollard gave Jerusalem before his arrest in 1985, renewed commitments that American citizens will not be recruited for Israeli espionage, and limitations on Pollard's freedom upon release. On the other hand, the indications are that Washington wants to put the Pollard Affair behind it. He has been in jail since 1985 and his intelligence information is clearly dated. There is also pressure for his release from American Jewish leaders, who could help Vice President Al Gore win Jewish support for his presidential campaign in 2000.

Obtaining Pollard's release will obviously require secret and intense negotiations involving some give and take. With Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu this week visiting the US along with a retinue of his most senior advisers, these negotiations can begin immediately. A serious effort on the part of the government now can finally bring about the sight of a smiling Jonathan Pollard, clutching his Israeli passport, landing at Ben-Gurion Airport.

Israel alone

URI DAN
DENNIS EISENBERG

Center stage is dominated by the two US arch-magnates, Madeleine Albright and Hillary Clinton, out to pound Israel into submission and bow to Yasser Arafat's dream of ruling a Palestinian state with its capital in Jerusalem.

But it is backstage where the real Middle East drama is building up into a huge upheaval. One which not only is liable to become an all-out crisis for the Jewish state, but also threatens the rest of the region, and the stability of Western Europe and even the US.

Clues to this very real scenario are giving deep concern to the intelligence services of Israel, the US and Western Europe. Above all, they are stoking the ambitions of Saddam Hussein to such an extent that he flexes his muscles with the arrogance of a man who believes his wildest dreams are on the verge of becoming reality.

His goal is to become master of the entire Gulf region and hold the West in thrall to his ambition of controlling the lifeblood of the West and Japan — i.e. the oil of the Gulf states, Kuwait and of course Saudi Arabia.

The facts are so startling that President Clinton has been moved out in a recent editorial, "Iraq is still cheating," alarming reports are reaching Western intelligence that Iraq continues to pursue an active policy of hiding vast quantities of unconventional weapons, it is hard at work trying to widen both their range and potency.

Nothing has made this clearer than the efforts of Saddam's agents to persuade Pakistani nuclear weapon specialists to supply "our Moslem brothers in the front line against Israeli-Americans" with technology needed to rid the Middle East of their presence.

Proof of this was prompted by Saddam's son-in-law when he defected to the West in 1996. As head of the Iraqi secret weapons procurement program, he handed over vast files which proved that Pakistan showed much sympathy to Iraq's nuclear ambitions. Information given to the International Atomic Agency is causing great concern about the cooperation between Iraq and Pakistan, which has the skill to put together at least one atomic bomb. Pakistan has recently been sharply criticized by the US for obtaining key missile parts from North Korea, and there is no doubt that this material is also being made available to Iraq.

Sensing that Saddam is now wielding the whip in the Middle East, Suhail Arafat sent two plane-loads of medical supplies from El Arish in Egypt to Iraq recently for "your sick and starving children," to underline the Palestinian support for him.

Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states are also discreetly dispatching friendly feelers towards Saddam as they feel increasingly disenchanted by what they discern as a weak president crippled by personal problems that dominate his twilight period in the White House. Britain's Tony Blair appears to be the sole Western leader to give signs of strong leadership as the curtain heralding the end of the 20th century descends, and Israel faces a life or death challenge from Iraq.

The depths of Baghdad's doom were underscored when a Channel 2 News reporter — on a CNN program with other journalists — asked Saddam's right-hand man, Tariq Aziz, if his country did the right thing by taking precautions against a possible gas or chemical attack during the recent Gulf crisis.

With a sneer on his face, Aziz refused to reply. The message is clear: Israel, and Israel alone, must address the aggressive intentions posed by the brutal dictator.

Will Israel's prime minister be bold and resourceful enough to take the necessary steps to stop Saddam Hussein in his tracks? His courage in standing up to Washington's blackmail this week is an encouraging sign that his nerve will not fail him.

Bonfires among the vanities

HELEN SCHARY MOTRO

The last place kids want to build the campfire of their dreams is in the vacant lot between their mother's kitchen window and the neighbor's wash. So as soon as they passed kindergarten age, the kids around here did everything to escape the neighborhood on Lag Ba'omer.

Since they couldn't travel very far, they used to hold their class bonfires on the sandy stretches at the outskirts of town, known for some hopeful reason as the "industrial zone." Fires would burn every 50 meters or so. Children scampered in circles poking sticks in and out of the flames, or sang in unison with their heads on one another's shoulders. Meanwhile the parents would stand a little ways off in a huddle, trying to read their watches by firelight, cradling coffee in paper cups, and waiting for the all-clear signal to take their children home. They balefully eyed the surrounding wasteland, hoping their car tires wouldn't get stuck in the sand traps that masqueraded as public thoroughfares.

But if they did get stuck, they were in the right place. For the industrial zone of Herzliya was home to a variety of automotive repair shops — and to very little else. One open-air restaurant served pita stuffed with meatballs intended to be washed down with a Tempo. After seven, the place was a ghost town. In short, the perfect location for a bonfire.

A MERE decade later Herzliya's industrial zone appears to enjoy the GNP of a mid-size emerging nation. The crowds, surging at noon down the cobblestones of the newly paved sidewalks are reminiscent of the energized masses of New York or Hong Kong.

Sporting dark sunglasses, designer sport shirts, and sleek NIS 120 haircuts, these straight-aways talk animatedly to one another, appear oblivious to the outside world, and are in a hurry to get wherever they are going. But most remarkable about the anti-flower children — it is almost impossible to find one single face older than 35.

Their fame has spread far beyond Israel's Silco's Valley. The Economist of May 18th featured a hot new company called Mirabilis whose software has been used by 11 million people worldwide. Where does little Mirabilis call home? Where else but our modest industrial zone...

Logos of famous high-tech brands may tower over the new glass and steel office buildings, but the real power is hidden deep inside. There dynamic young brains click their ideas onto electronic receivers, hoping to become another Mirabilis.

Fledgling firms ticked into nameless offices aim for a $1 million share offering on the New York Stock Exchange — or at least some frenzied trading down in Tel Aviv.

These energetic yuppies exit their offices to find a myriad of merchants eager to lure the plastic from their wallets. Every major bank has opened at least one branch in the industrial zone. There are stores displaying Parisian clothing, designer lighting, imported liquors, Italian home designs, European office equipment. One building boasts a state-of-the-art fitness center open 16 hours a day.

Every inch of soil is utilized; cranes and construction abound. New mini-malls seem to mushroom once a month. The few remaining plots of unbuild land have been paved over to make in lucrative fees in this parking nightmare. There are underground garages and one huge new building consecrated solely for high-level parking.

The restaurants alone could fill an entire Red Michelin. Within one random two-block area I counted: one Indian, two Japanese, one Spanish, one fish, one seafood, two Chinese, three steak houses, one "Jewish," one espresso bar, one upscale cafe, three Italian, one "humus plus," one French, two American, one fast food, one ice cream parlor and one Hungarian.

And I probably missed some. What's going through their heads as they wolf down basilicum sandwiches on Parmesan bread dribbled with extra virgin olive oil? "I feel sorry for them," my fifth friend asserted with a grin. "They never had the Sixties..." At dusk their upwardly mobile cars choke the exits to the highway.

But the industrial zone is never empty nowadays. In their place affluent suburbanites throng hungrily in to the second shift of dinners provided by the ecstatic restaurateurs.

But time and the Jewish calendar wait for no man. Lag Ba'omer rolls around again. Where can kids go to hold their campfires nowadays? Still dying to escape the vacant lot underneath their mothers' watchful gaze, they've unearthed a new pristine locale not far from the industrial zone: the beach. That's one place where the municipality hasn't issued too many building permits — yet.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

DANA AS ROLE MODEL

Sir, — Contrary to David Bedein's contention on behalf of the people of Israel "Dana International" (May 11), the taxpayers' contribution to Dana International's appearance at the Eurovision was completely justified.

The declaration of the establishment of the State of Israel clearly states: "The State of Israel...will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all the inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex..."

Dana represented Israel in a pop musical competition; her sexual identity was irrelevant. We can all rejoice in her accomplishment and in the return on our investment.

Also, contrary to his claim, Dana can be incorporated into mainstream family values. We struggle to teach our children to be true to themselves despite the forces of conformity which press upon them. Dana is a role model for the right of the individual and the minority to be different: she is also a role model for the courage and determination to succeed for one's own sake and for the country.

Like Joey Silver "Gay family values" (May 12), I am national religious; unlike him I am not homosexual. But homosexuals are also created in the Divine image and I pray that the interpreters of the Halacha will soon find a way to embrace Silver's inclusivity and accommodate homosexuality.

Unlike Silver, I am not a Herutnik. My dream is that the May 1999 Eurovision will be held in a Jerusalem of peace — and that we'll be able to vote for a Palestinian entrant.

B.J. HOLLANDER

Jerusalem.

WAY TO GO!

Sir, — I fail to understand the brouhaha over Dana International. Here is a person who was unhappy as a man and had the courage and conviction to do something about it.

To think that since winning the Eurovision, that the youth of Israel will follow her lead is to disregard our education system, trivialize our parenting, and most important underestimate our sons' intelligence. What Dana went through was costly, painful and not something rushed into.

She is a woman now and should not be judged for being born a man. The past is just that — the past.

A religious person who was once a belly dancer or a porn performer is not any less a person today due to their past.

Dana International is a singer who went to the Eurovision Contest and through her own poise, talent, gumption, and a great song won.

In my opinion, way to go girl!

STATE RELIGION

Sir, — Jonathan Rosenblum, in "Bashava uncovered" (May 8), writes that cultural sensitivity would be appropriate at a government-sponsored celebration "even if Judaism were not Israel's official religion."

Yes indeed, but since when does the State of Israel have an official religion? The government supports several religions, of which Judaism is only the most prominent.

65 years ago: On May 14, 1933, The Palestine Post reported that anti-Nazi phrases were chalked up on and in front of the German consulate in Jerusalem. In London, a wreath which Herr Hitler's representative Herr Rosenberg placed on the cenotaph at Whitehall was thrown into the Thames by an ex-serviceman, Captain J.E. Sears, who was fined forty shillings for willfully damaging the wreath.

50 years ago: On May 14,

1948, The Palestine Post reported that the Jewish state would be proclaimed that day and the 33-man National Council would become the provisional council of government. It was announced that the declaration would be made at a modest assembly meeting somewhere in Tel Aviv. A three-point proclamation was expected to be issued authorizing the National Council to enact the state's authority abrogating the White Paper legislation and retaining all other legislation until the new code of laws was enacted.

25 years ago: On May 14, 1973, The Jerusalem Post reported the cabinet's decision that Arabs from all over the world would soon be able to visit relatives in the administered areas and East Jerusalem the whole year round and not only during the summer months.

Hollywood tightens its belt

After years of making high-budget films, the major studios are scaling down their production costs

By PAUL FARM and SHARON WAXMAN

Few stars in Hollywood have been as bankable as Arnold Schwarzenegger. Yet last month Warner Bros. suspended plans to produce the actor's latest would-be epic, I Am Legend — a remake of the 1971 mutant-inherit-the-earth film The Omega Man.

The reason Legend was dropped: a projected budget of more than $100 million and a still-unfinished script, the sci-fi story didn't seem like a "smart bet" for the time being, said Warner co-chairman Robert Daly.

Warner's newfound caution says much about the general unease in the movie business these days. Despite a record box office haul of $6.4 billion last year, the industry seems to be no joy in Make-It-Or-Buy Land.

Low-budget, low-risk films are the industry's new focus, and executives are concluding that the economics of moviemaking just don't add up.

As Daly, one of the most experienced executives in the industry, says, "Two years ago, the economics were totally different. As they are now, we have some urgent problems right now."

Sound familiar? It should. Hollywood's spendthrift ways have caused periodic hand-wringing for decades. The last low boom publicly was from former president Jeffrey Katzenberg, whose much-leaked "internal memo" in 1991 warned of impending disaster if the industry didn't get some fiscal discipline.

There's one big thing working against such bold-the-line cheer-history. The business founded on the material of human talent, movies are subject to the same bidding spirals as professional sports. "It's like losing weight," observes Douglas Gomery, a professor of Maryland professor studies the economics of the movie and entertainment business.

They're always declaring that it's time to go on a diet. At the same time, they're unbelievably nervous that they're going to miss the next boat. They can't help themselves.

Yet on the eve of the summer movie season, there are several reasons to believe something has to give, that current conditions are fundamentally different from those of, say, the past two decades.

For one thing, filmmakers must try to appeal simultaneously to two very different demographic groups — a younger audience of frequent moviegoers and the huge mass of aging baby boomers.

What's more, there don't seem to be any technological breakthroughs — like VCRs, cable and satellite TV in the recent past — that could provide new customers and income streams. Digital video discs — a new, improved version of the videocassette — haven't taken off yet, and high-definition TV won't be widespread until some time in the next decade, at the earliest.

The movie industry also seems to be the only business in the world not enjoying cost savings from new technologies. If anything, the opposite is true.

Ubiquitous computer-driven special effects — everything from Titanic's tumbling bodies to the city-destroying tidal wave in Deep Impact — are a major reason why production costs jumped by more than a third for the average big-studio release last year, the biggest increase in decades.

If new costs Disney, Paramount, Fox, Warner and the other studios an average of $53.4 million to produce a film — nearly double what it cost as recently as 1992. Marketing costs — mainly expensive TV and newspaper ads — added another $22.3m. per film, almost twice what it cost in 1990.

All this has put pressure on profits and on the executives hired to generate them.

When returns start resembling those of a passbook savings account, "(It) keeps you questioning your choices," said Tom Pollock, a former head of Universal Pictures who now heads a production company.

At that point you make movies to keep the (film) library fresh, to build an asset base, so when you sell your company you can sell it for more."

Studios are responding in time-honored fashion: by cutting production slates, talking about fiscal discipline and chopping off heads. At Universal, now owned by the Canadian beverage company Seagrams Co., an executive purge began last month following a lackluster 1997 and a disappointing box office start this year.

After a thin slate of films last year, the studio had high hopes for its pricey, prestigious project Primary Colors. Despite critical praise and a $65m. budget, it has so far earned a disappointing $38m. domestically.

Another recent big-budget release, the Bruce Willis action movie Mercury Rising, has done worse, generating just $28 million.

Even Arnold Schwarzenegger is affected by Tinseltown's new fiscal discipline.

Universal's upcoming releases aren't generating much excitement within industry circles, either.

Warner illustrates the new Hollywood shuffle. For nearly two decades, the studio prospered by making movies with big-name stars who nearly guaranteed box office success. But more recently, it has turned out one dud after another — from Batman and Robin with George Clooney and Schwarzenegger to Mad City with Dustin Hoffman and John Travolta, and Kevin Costner's disastrous The Postman.

While acknowledging that 1997 "was a bad year," Warner's Daly says the answer is to do more with less — by making fewer and better films. Next year and beyond, the studio plans to release about 20 movies, compared with about 30 a year until this year.

Beyond the new stress on better management, however, there's a palpable sense of uncertainty at the studios. No one has ever really known how to guarantee a hit, but the task of making even a moderately successful film these days is complicated by ferocious competition and the complex demographic trends.

Hollywood has only recently begun to respond to the newly re-emergent teenage market, the driving force behind the surprise success of the two Scream horror films and its clone, I Know What You Did Last Summer.

This group is also fueling the phenomenal repeat business of Titanic — particularly among teenage girls who idolize star Leonardo DiCaprio.

The confusion is reflected not only in the shake-ups at major studios but in the diverse choices moviegoers now have at the multiplex.

"The studios are still on a learning curve," said Chris Pula, Warner's former marketing chief, who also headed marketing at New Line for several years. "They have not caught up with the audience, and they've created their own hell in producing this movie tonnage," she said.

"Now the power has shifted to the consumer who is telling us, 'I don't want derivative. I want original, risky product that I haven't seen before.'"

Great shakes

By SONE LEMOR

If you did a survey of which street in Tel Aviv had the most coffee shops per person, the first on the list would be Sheinkin Street. And located in the center of the mass is Sus Eitz, a place where I like to sit when I'm in Tel Aviv.

Sus Eitz is situated directly in front of a small park where young couples conveniently leave their children while enjoying a fresh fruit shake or milk shake at one of the outside tables at Sus Eitz. When sitting at this trendy café, you can expect many of the aspiring young actors, musicians and artists of Tel Aviv to stroll by, all decked out and looking to be discovered.

Outside there are about 15 tables, usually full, being served by would-be actresses. Nothing fancy, the tables are simple wooden affairs, with wooden, not very comfortable folding chairs.

Inside on the right is a bar with a funky artist-type bartender and another 20 or so tables, also usually full.

"My husband, Eran, and I are partners," says co-owner Adi Ramati. "Sus Eitz has been in existence for six years," she adds proudly.

Next to the bar is a staircase that leads up to a gallery. Until recently you could purchase all sorts of gimmicks there, like inflatable plastic chairs and Dali style clocks. "We are changing the concept of the gallery," Adi comments. "We want to sell things that are more related to the food industry, like unique glasses and plates, maybe even homemade foods." According to Adi, this new gallery will be open in about a month.

Speaking of food, the culinary experience at Sus Eitz is quite good. The menu is a bit pricey but the portions are large and make up for it. (A Greek salad costs NIS 28, for example, with an additional NIS 7 for bread and butter.) The two dishes that I most recommend are padthai (Thai noodles NIS 35) and chicken breast in a cream and mustard sauce (NIS 35). The padthai at Sus Eitz is one of the major reasons that I frequent the place. "It's amazing," asserts actor and singer Yehzekel Lazarov. "I never thought that an Israeli coffee shop would serve something like this."

Padthai is a dish of angel hair rice noodles, slices of chicken breast, vegetables and peanuts in a soy sauce. The chicken in cream and mustard sauce is a bit heavy during the hot summer days but for evening munchies, it is a definite hit.

Sus Eitz serves a decent cup of coffee and excellent fresh fruit shakes.

This popular hang-out is open on Friday nights and Saturday afternoons, so after baking in the sun at the beach (roughly a 10-minute walk away), you can indulge in the fashionable fun of Sus Eitz.

Sus Eitz is open from 9 a.m. until at least 1 a.m. seven days a week.

MK Yuri Stern talks about his favorite painters

Israel Ba'aliya MK Yuri Stern was born in Moscow in 1949. With a Ph.D. in economics from Moscow University, he worked in his field until he was permitted to make aliya in 1981. Unable to secure an invitation for immigration, Stern says he was "a Jewish activist without being a refusenik."

He lives in Gilo with his wife, floral designer Elena Stern. They have two children.

Stern is a member of the Foreign Affairs and the Security Committee in the Knesset, as well as the Absorption and Labor and Social Relations committees. He is also chairman of the Israel-Russia Interdisciplinary (Friendship) Association, which strives to foster goodwill and understanding between the two nations.

A great art enthusiast Stern says, "I loved the museums in Moscow, and I miss them here. The Israel Museum in Jerusalem is a good one. I go there sometimes to relax."

Here he talks about his five favorite artists.

a small nation. He was not known anywhere in the world, not even in Budapest. His representation of Jerusalem opened a new world for me in which to see Jews."

2. Edvard Munch

"He was a Norwegian artist, one of the predecessors of expressionist art. The Tel Aviv Museum has a good collection of his graphics. He had a great ability to play with colors — sometimes bright, sometimes variations of the dull gray/blue of the northern landscape. This was the most striking for me. His recurring theme is the 'aloneness' of people: the transposition of life into death. Sex and death. Sex as an attempt to escape from the aloneness — but an unsuccessful one. No one expresses that more strongly than Munch. In his paintings you see people standing near each other but isolated. Or sitting at a death bed. Or the cosmos, with infinite space around us."

3. Maurits Cornelis Escher

"He was a Dutch graphic artist who played a lot with geometric forms. He displayed a kind of graphics humor by playing with line and form in classic perspective, then suddenly showing something surreal. Water flowing uphill, for example. Or buildings in which by going upstairs, you move downstairs. He did a lot of parody; he was very intellectual."

4. Goya

"The work of this Spanish artist is unbelievable — his modernism. Some of his paintings are classics, very well known worldwide. But the amazing thing is that some of his pictures look like they were painted a century later. They are partly expressionist/surrealist and partly a result of his mental problem that pushed him into changing the rules of classic painting."

5. Michael Vrubel

"This Russian painter started off doing classic Russian academic art. Then he developed a symbolism of his own, with a very special attitude toward color and broken forms. Some of his images look like a combination of cubism and pointillism, as though he were breaking the picture into small pieces, like a mosaic. Vrubel used a unique violet/purple. It was a strange kind of mystic, colorful space that seems to be very deep, with mysterious things covered in the depth of that color. Although Vrubel was one of the greatest artists of Russia, he was virtually unknown abroad."

'Almost-vegetarian' — and loving it

So you're not totally vegetarian, but not a major carnivore either? You're in tune with the latest trend, and Laura Fraser and Martha Rose Shulman have recipes to help you make the most of it

We are increasingly hearing people say they are not strictly vegetarian — but don't really fit in with the carnivores, either. So what does that make them?

More and more people are cutting back on meat while adding more fruits, vegetables and grains to their daily diets. But unlike those who label themselves "vegetarian," they sometimes still eat — and enjoy — seafood, dairy products, poultry, and even red meat.

We've dubbed people like these "almost-vegetarians" (which sounds better than "occasional carnivores"). And their ranks are growing.

Many AVs who have cut back on red meat more than on any other kind of food point first to health reasons, saying that the less meat they eat, the better they feel. Others are watching their cholesterol and weight; still others are moving away from childhoods in which meat was the star of almost every home meal.

There are other reasons, too. For some it's a choice made out of concern for animals, or the environment.

Are there any downsides to being an almost-vegetarian? One AV says that "the only tricky part has been explaining it to my carnivorous family and friends, because I don't have one specific reason for my choice. And some people can't resist poking a little fun — good-naturedly — at me, trying to find the loopholes in my diet."

But by and large, the positives outweigh the negatives.

"It's amazing to me how many choices I have," says one enthusiastic AV. "I have rediscovered foods like couscous, that I never had when meals almost always consisted of some kind of meat."

To fit in with an almost-vegetarian diet, the following recipes offer a range — from totally meatless to a turkey burger.

ZUCCHINI-AND-FETA GRATIN

2 1/2 cups hot, cooked long-grain rice
1 cup crumbled feta cheese, divided cooking spray
4 cups zucchini, sliced 1/2 cm.

thick
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1 tsp. dried mint flakes
dash of ground nutmeg
3 large eggs, lightly beaten

Preheat oven to 190°. Combine rice and 1/2 cup feta cheese in a bowl and then press mixture into a 25 cm. quiche dish or pie plate coated with cooking spray.

Steam zucchini slices, covered, for 5 minutes. Press zucchini gently between paper towels until barely moist. Combine zucchini, remaining feta cheese, salt, and pepper in a medium-sized bowl and arrange mixture evenly over rice.

Combine mint flakes, nutmeg and eggs, stirring well with a whisk. Pour over zucchini mixture. Bake at 190° for 40 minutes. (Serves 8.)

PASTA E FAGIOLI

Almost any type of bean (such as pinto beans or chickpeas) works in this traditional Italian soup.

1/2 kg. dried navy beans
1 Tbsp. olive oil

1 cup chopped onion
1/2 cup sliced carrot
1/2 cup chopped celery
4 garlic cloves, crushed, divided
800-900 gr. can diced tomatoes, undrained
9 cups water
1/4 tsp. crushed red pepper
1 bay leaf
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. oregano
1/2 tsp. thyme
1/4 tsp. rosemary
1/4 cup uncooked medium elbow macaroni
1 cup chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1/4 cup grated fresh Parmesan cheese

Sort and wash beans and place in a large pot. Cover with water to 5 cm. above beans, bring to a boil, and cook for 2 minutes. Remove beans from heat, cover and let stand for 1 hour. Drain beans in a colander.

Heat oil in pan over medium heat until hot. Add onion, carrot, and celery and sauté 5 minutes or until tender. Add half of garlic and cook 1 minute. Add tomatoes and Spring signals the beginning of picnic season. The weather is clear and, an occasional heat wave notwithstanding, far more pleasant than summer for eating outdoors.

Unfortunately, eating outdoors can be dangerous, depending on how you prepare and store the food you eat — and, of course — your choice of food. Here are some tips for making your picnic easier, more pleasant and safer.

For ice, freeze plastic water bottles. Use them as you would use ice packs to keep food chilled. The benefit is that you'll also have a cold drink on hand as the ice melts. (Some people also like to use them as weights for exercising.)

If you don't have a picnic cooler, line a basket or box with a blanket and cover with a large plastic bag. Fill with frozen water bottles or the blue ice packs that are refreezable. Always chill food well before putting it into the cooler.

Always double wrap raw meat, fish or chicken to make sure juices don't leak and contaminate other foods. If you plan to prepare food on-site, bring along two cutting boards — one for the raw meat and one for everything else. Bacteria from raw meat juices can make you very sick.

Avoid making foods with mayonnaise in the dressing. Use dressings based on olive or other oil instead. Avoid fish or egg salads altogether because they tend to spoil quickly.

Keep the cooler or picnic basket in the car if possible during the trip to the picnic site. The trunk usually gets too hot. When you get there, keep the cooler in the shade and cover it with a blanket to keep it cold.

If you are planning to take a long trip before you get to your picnic site, and are planning to grill at the picnic site, keep the chicken or meat frozen (you also can put it in a freezer container with a marinade) and let it defrost on the way.

You can make portable salt and pepper shakers (or other spice containers) by filling straws with the seasoning and bending or twisting the ends to close.

Bacteria grows very quickly at warm temperatures, so when the picnic's over, throw out smoked meats, potato or pasta salad, and meat or chicken. Although it's tempting to take home leftovers, they have been sitting around for hours and even when kept in a cooler, it is dangerous to take them home and eat them the next day (or even the same day).

PICNIC POTATO SALAD

Here's a great salad to take along on picnics. It's so good you'll want to make a double batch and keep half at home.

4 large potatoes olive oil salt and pepper
2 cups bean sprouts for the dressing:
1/4 cup oil (mostly olive oil if possible)
1/2 cup lemon juice
2 Tbsp. chopped onion
1/2 cup chopped parsley

Scrub the potatoes but don't peel them. Rub potatoes with a little olive oil, salt and pepper and wrap in aluminum foil. Bake at medium heat (180°C) till tender. Remove, cool to room temperature and cut into large chunks.

Combine potato slices and sprouts and season with salt and pepper.

Prepare the dressing by beating together the oil, lemon juice and onion and then add the parsley. Let sit 10 minutes before pouring on the salad. (Serves 6.)

What is chervil, and what is it called in Hebrew? Is it available here and where? Can I use it like parsley? Does it have any redeeming features besides its taste?

— Meredith Marks, Ra'anana

Chervil is a green herb about which a 16th century English herbalist wrote, "It is good for old people — it rejoiceth and comforteth the heart and increaseth their strength."

In France, chervil is popular as a seasoning for salads, soups and fish. It has a delicate anise flavor and is called anise in Hebrew even though the name is incorrect. It should be used fresh since cooking destroys its flavor.

Because of its pronounced taste, it is usually used along with parsley and not instead of it.

It may sometimes be purchased in the greens section of a souk, but is generally found only at gourmet grocers.

Chervil is considered to be helpful in relieving eye infections. Steep the chopped leaves in boiling water, cool to body temperature and apply to the eye with an eye cup.

I read your recent warning about insecticides and lettuce. Can you tell me if Gush Katif lettuce is sprayed with insecticide? Do you think it is OK to eat? Can you tell us what vegetables are the safest to consume? Can you tell me where it is possible to buy organic lettuce? Thanks.

— S. Schneer, Jerusalem

The type of Gush Katif lettuce that is advertised as being worm-free is neither grown nor marketed as organic lettuce. It is grown under netting and is treated with pesticides.

The "safety" of vegetables depends on the grower, but it is generally accepted that lettuce, cottonseed oil, fresh herbs and celery are heavily treated with a variety of systemic and non-systemic pesticides. I also try to avoid waxed vegetables and fruits.

Your local health-food store is a good place to look for organic vegetables.

bring to a boil. Cover, reduce heat, and simmer for 10 minutes, stirring occasionally.

Add beans, 9 cups water, red pepper, and bay leaf and bring to a boil. Cover, reduce heat, and simmer for 1 hour and 50 minutes. Add salt, oregano, thyme, rosemary, and remaining garlic, cover and simmer 25 minutes or until beans are tender. Discard bay leaf.

Place 2 cups bean mixture in a food processor and process until smooth. Return bean puree to pan and stir well. Add pasta; cook 7 minutes or until pasta is done. Remove from heat and stir in parsley and black pepper.

Ladle soup into bowls and sprinkle with cheese. (Serves 8.)

RIGATONI WITH SUGAR SNAP PEAS AND COTTAGE CHEESE PESTO

1 cup cottage cheese
2 garlic cloves
1 cup basil leaves
1/4 cup grated Parmesan cheese
2 Tbsp. plain yogurt
1 Tbsp. olive oil
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
3 cups sugar snap peas, trimmed
4 cups hot, cooked rigatoni

Combine cottage cheese and garlic in a food processor and process until smooth, scraping sides of bowl once. Add basil, Parmesan cheese, yogurt, oil, salt, and pepper; process until finely smooth.

Steam peas, covered, 5 minutes or until crisp-tender. Combine pesto, peas, and pasta in a large bowl; tossing well. (Serves 4.)

ASIAN-STYLE TURKEY BURGERS

This recipe calls for ground turkey, which includes both light and dark meat. You can trim the fat even more by substituting ground turkey breast, though the burgers will not be quite as flavorful.

450 gr. ground turkey
1/2 cup finely chopped onion
3 Tbsp. finely chopped fresh parsley

2 Tbsp. Worcestershire sauce
2 Tbsp. minced green bell pepper
1 Tbsp. soy sauce
1 Tbsp. cold water
2 tsp. grated peeled fresh ginger
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
2 garlic cloves, minced
cooking spray
4 hamburger buns

Combine the first 11 ingredients in a large bowl. Divide mixture into 4 equal portions, shaping each into a 2 cm. thick patty.

Place a large nonstick skillet coated with cooking spray over medium-high heat until hot. Add patties and cook 5 minutes on each side or until done. Serve on buns. (Serves 4.)

TURKISH CHICKPEA STEW

Dried beans, a low-fat, high-protein meat replacement, star in this one-dish meal.

1 Tbsp. olive oil
1 cup thinly sliced onion

1 tsp. fennel seeds, crushed
1 tsp. brown sugar
1/2 tsp. cumin
4 garlic cloves, crushed
3 1/2 cups chopped tomato
1 Tbsp. white wine vinegar
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. crushed red pepper
4 cups trimmed spinach
4 cups water
2 450 gr. cans chickpeas, drained
2 Tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
2 Tbsp. chopped fresh mint
2 tsp. chopped fresh dill

Heat olive oil in a large pot over medium-high heat. Add onion and sauté 5 minutes.

Add fennel, sugar, cumin, and garlic and cook 1 minute. Stir in tomato, vinegar, salt, and pepper and sauté for 10 minutes or until slightly thick. Stir in spinach, water, and chickpeas and bring to a boil.

Cover, reduce heat, and simmer 30 minutes. Remove from heat and stir in parsley, mint, and dill. (Serves 4.)

A capsule of Israelite history at Tel Hatzor

Weekender Travel

The road between Rosh Pina and Kiryat Shmona, opposite Kibbutz Ayelet Hashahar, slices along the shoulder of high, looming, expansive Tel Hatzor, with only fragments of ancient walls exposed through the grass, thistles and earth. It is a sharp juxtaposition, this modern highway filled with zooming cars and drivers, who are probably unaware of the epic struggle and transition that occurred upon the site they skirt.

The top of Tel Hatzor, which is a national park, has a stunning view to the North, straight up the verdant Hula Valley to Mt. Hermon with its fingers of snow. In ancient times the view was also strategic, enabling the monitoring of all traffic upon this vital trade and military route.

Some 3,500 to 4,000 years ago a large, sophisticated, powerfully fortified Canaanite city-state straddled this junction. It was the largest city in the land; the Book of Joshua calls it "the head of all those kingdoms" in the region. It was Jabin, king of Hatzor, who organized and led a great alliance of armies from Canaanite tribes and city-states, "even as the sand that is upon the seashore in multitude, with very many horses and chariots (Joshua 11:4)," to stop the Israelites, who had fought their way through Canaan from the desert.

The intruders had no permanent homes, no land, no chariots. But with unstoppable fervor they crashed like a wave against the aligned armies "by the waters of Merom," in northern Canaan, and swept them away.

The Israelites, though ruthless in their treatment of cities during their earlier conquests in the land, left the cities of these allied armies alone, with one exception.

Joshua killed Jabin of Hatzor, and then the victorious Israelites "smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, used to destroying them: there was not any left to breathe; and he burnt Hatzor with fire."

TODAY, Tel Hatzor, about 800 dunams in area, is the largest archeological site in Israel.

Divided into an upper and lower section, there is still much to be done there.

It is the lower of the two sections, hidden beneath the fields across from Ayelet Hashahar, that holds within it the magnificence of Bronze Age Hatzor.

The parameters of the Bronze Age city are clearly delineated by a long embankment, where protective ramparts rose.

The huge expanse is largely unexcavated. But selective excavation map and numbered sites will help you find order in the ruins.

DAVID CONQUERED the ruined mound of Hatzor. Solomon recognized and utilized its strategic importance by reconstructing the city and making it one of his three chariot cities, along with Gezer and Megiddo.

Here, we can find the foundation of the same kind of massive triple-chambered gate, once guarded by two towers, that can be found in Megiddo. Solomon built a fortress on the western edge of the tel to guard the road, which passed on that side.

After the northern tribes split off from the south to form the Kingdom of Israel, the powerful King Omri doubled the size of Solomon's city and used at least part of the old city walls for storerooms (which can be seen).

Omri's son Ahab, fearing incursions into his small, strategic but exposed kingdom, executed a masterful engineering project, still visible today, to secure the city's water source, as he also did at Megiddo.

While at Megiddo, Ahab gouged a long tunnel through the bedrock to reach a spring outside the city walls. Here at Hatzor he needed to scoop out a huge hole in the midst of the city and support it adequately with retaining walls.

He then cut a square pier down into the bedrock and carved a slanted, stepped tunnel into an aquifer, 45 meters from the top.

When you climb down there (remember, you'll also have to climb back up), you'll admire the precise and detailed measurements, and the masterful carving along the edges of the stone pier.

And the slanted tunnel (those are the originals, from Ahab's time, that you're stepping on) are clearly wide enough for a continuous, orderly procession of water-gathering.

A wide range of artifacts from Hatzor's 14 excavation areas and 21 levels, as well as a scale model of its upper and lower cities, can be seen in the small antiquities museum at Kibbutz Ayelet Hashahar. If you're visiting the tel, a visit to the museum is worthwhile.

The museum at Ayelet Hashahar is open daily 8 a.m.-4 p.m.; Fri. to 3 p.m.; closed Sat. Tel. (06) 693-4855.

Summer hours for Tel Hatzor National Park are: 8 a.m.-5 p.m. daily, 8 a.m.-4 p.m. on Friday. There is an entrance fee. Tel. (06) 693-7290.

Day Tripper By Haim Shapiro

Where 'he walked upon the water'

If it had not been for the Syrians, Bethsaida might still be the great mystery site of the New Testament.

That at least was the view of Father Bargil Pixner. He recounted that in the 1930s, the eminent archeologist William Albright visited the tel now recognized to be Bethsaida and said that it could not possibly have been a Hellenistic and Roman settlement.

That was before the Syrians occupied the hillside following the War of Independence and used it as a fortification, with trenches and bunkers.

Pixner recalled climbing through those same trenches after the Six Day War and picking up bits of Hellenistic and Roman remains.

One of the items he found, Pixner said recently when the site was officially opened to visitors, was a potsherd with a cross - an indication that the site was sacred to early Christians. He became more convinced than ever that this was the site of Bethsaida.

It was here that three of Jesus's disciples were born and where some of the major miracles of the New Testament are said to have occurred, such as the feeding of the multitudes and the healing of a blind man. And it was from Bethsaida's shores that Jesus was seen "walking on the Sea of Galilee."

Now, after 11 years of excavations under the direction of Dr. Rami Arav on behalf of the University of Nebraska at Omaha, the experts appear to have little doubt that this was the place, despite the fact that Bethsaida was described as a fishing port on Lake Kinneret and the tel is two kilometers from the sea.

Apparently, the experts say, a massive earthquake in the second century CE caused a landslide which not only covered the town but also moved the shoreline. Bethsaida was abandoned and forgotten.

A minimalist approach has been used in its reconstruction.

There is a short section of road from the Roman period. It is considered especially important for the thousands of Christian pilgrims expected to visit during the year 2000, since Jesus and his disciples could well have walked on this very road.

One house is known as the wine merchant's house, since the archeologists found four wine jars in a wine cellar behind the kitchen. Another house is known as the fisherman's house, as the experts uncovered fishing gear there. Both are important for the Christian visitors, since they relate to New Testament miracles, as well as to the fact that many of Jesus's disciples were fishermen.

For visitors, there is a meditation area and an observation point, which includes arrows pointing to other New Testament sites.

We should remember, however, that while the town is associated with Jesus, it existed much earlier, during the period of the Judean Kingdom.

From that period, there is a magnificent gateway, which Arav described as the largest in the area. He also suggested that this was where Absalom fled from the wrath of his father, King David.

There are still no signs directing the visitor to the gateway. To find it, you should stand at the observation point with your back to Lake Kinneret. Just over a small rise, you can see a large eucalyptus tree. Taking care not to fall into or trample on the excavations, go over the hill to the tree and you will find the gateway beside it, complete with a monumental, engraved pillar (stela) and a stone basin.

Another stela found at the site is currently on display at the Israel Museum.

To get to Bethsaida, go northward along Lake Kinneret, either from Tiberias or along the eastern shore. When you get to the Jordan Park, go into the entrance and turn off immediately on the dirt road to your left.

Ambient light, camera, action!

On Camera By David Brauner

Albert Einstein called photographers "light monkeys." Little wonder. After all, while the great physicist devoted much thought to light and its behavior, inconsiderate photographers were throwing flashed light in his face at every opportunity.

Photographers who supplement every picture they take with a burst of flash are robbing their pictures of individuality. Yes, with today's sophisticated flashguns, every image comes out sharp, bright, perfectly exposed... and dull. Ambient or available light photography is fast becoming a lost art. The average photographer has forgotten that it is perfectly possible to take a good picture and, often, a better picture, with whatever free light happens to be available.

The first advantage of leaving the flash in your gadget bag or turning it off (if it is an integral part of your camera and can be turned off), is a reduction in the "intimidation factor." Your subjects will feel more natural and relaxed. Consequently, your pictures will look more natural and relaxed.

Photographer David Finn, author of How to Look at Photographs (Abrams), recounts a session he spent with the late Rabbi Louis Finkelstein, head of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. "I took roll after roll of photographs of him as we sat talking in his modest apartment. To make it as informal as possible, I had not brought lights with me, relying instead on whatever light was available."

The soft-lit picture of Finkelstein in deep reflection with his hand over his face is set off against a blurred background of religious books. Had Finn used lighting, the face would have worn an out-of-synch harshness, and the books would have been sharp and distracting. With artificial light the profound mood of concentration would have been lost.

Arnold Newman's portrait of the American primitive painter, Grandma Moses, is a great natural light photograph that comes to mind. The sunlight streams through frilly curtains from three sides on the face of the old woman sitting in her rocking chair. A fern bush and teapot in the foreground are silhouetted against the light, the polished wooden floor blurs the shadows and whole image is slightly less than pin sharp, giving it a fitting antique quality.

By relying on whatever light is available - whether it is a tungsten bulb, fluorescent tube, an open fire, oil lamp, computer screen, neon sign, sunlight through a window, or even a candle or match - the photographer is taking a chance that the picture will not work for technical or aesthetic reasons. But by taking a chance on ambient light, the photographer is also accepting a challenge. No two pictures will ever be alike, because available light is never the same. Every situation will be different. The quality of the light itself becomes a key element in the image. Because the light is usually directional, it has a modeling effect that can outline a subject in a golden halo or divide a face in two: Half light, half shadow. Often the source of the light, a naked bulb or single flame, features as an important highlight in the composition.

Without getting too scientific about the physics of light intensity, the further your subject is from the source of the light, the weaker the light falling on the subject becomes. So, in poor light situations, take care to place the light nearer to the subject or the subject nearer to the light, if possible. For color, it is important to remember light itself displays color, often not seen by the human eye.

For instance, tungsten lighting is orange while fluorescent can be blue. Ordinary (daylight) color film is "balanced" for midday sunlight, to render colors most accurately when the light itself is "colorless." Daylight film will show a "color cast" if used in an available light situation without a correction filter or, dare I say it, flash to override the ambient conditions.

Another factor to bear in mind is that light travels through the glass of your camera's lens at about two-thirds of the speed it travels through air. Therefore, the light you see takes longer than you might think to reach the film through the lens. So it is imperative to use a light-sensitive film rated at 400 ASA/ISO or faster. You can also uprate 400 ASA film to 800 (one stop) or even 1600 (two stops) in order increase depth of field, shutter speed or both. If you uprate, then you have to "push" process the film accordingly: 33 percent longer development time for one stop, and 83% longer for two stops. The price for low light and extra speed is graininess and loss of shadow detail. But the cost is worth it. Guaranteed!

Guerlain's Champs-Elysees perfumed Radiant Body Lotion exudes a stronger fragrance than the same brand of eau de toilette and the scent lasts longer because it is massaged into the pores of the skin.

Cosmetics manufacturers are aiming for the natural look this summer as they take the heavy drama out of foundation creams, eye shadows, blushers and lipsticks.

Yves Saint Laurent has introduced transparent lipsticks, blushers and eye shadows in many colors and shades. Textures are creamy, leaving just a hint of bloom on cheeks and lips, and a faint glow around the eyes. The end result looks much less artificial than the usual war-paint job.

Il-Makiage has come out with a sheer, water-based liquid makeup foundation with sunscreen protection against UV rays. Even without a sponge applicator, it blends easily into the skin and enhances the tone. But Il-Makiage's Heylighter Dust, an eye shadow that can be used dry or wet to give glowing effects, should be repackaged, because it is messy in its present form, and much of its contents go to waste.

Soft Touch Quick Liner is a joy for anyone who has problems achieving that fine line on the edge of the lid. Neither too creamy nor too liquid, it has a better consistency than most other brands and a thinner wand which makes it easier to apply accurately.

Guerlain's Perfect Light Fluid Foundation is somewhat of a disappointment for a company that is generally known for its high-quality products. It doesn't feel smooth to the touch, and it takes too long to set. Initially, it looks like stage makeup, which can be quite frightening to anyone looking in a mirror immediately after application, but once it sets, the color changes and it looks perfectly natural.

Guerlain's Champs-Elysees perfumed Radiant Body Lotion, on the other hand, gets top marks. It actually exudes a stronger fragrance than the same brand of eau de toilette, and the scent lasts longer because it is massaged into the pores of the skin. It both feels good and smells good.

Also smelling good is Homme de Gres, the new, fresh and slightly aromatic fragrance for men from the famous Paris-based perfume house. Invigorating without being overpowering, it suggests good breeding, and is definitely manly, unlike some of the new unisex fragrances on the market.

In this merciless heat, achieving the wet look with hair is no big deal, since perspiration does just that. But Schwartz Wet Look styling cream and conditioner, boosted by olive oil and myrtle extract, gives hair a better sheen than perspiration, and certainly smells better. It can be used on either dry or damp hair.

No game other than bridge is more suited to the cliché "Rules were meant to be broken." A new book, Focus on Defense (Master Point Press, Toronto), written by Danny Roth of London, England, is excellent for learning when and how to break the rules we were taught as beginners.

Today's deal, from the book, is a perfect example. We all know the rules of thumb, "second-hand low, third-hand high." These refer to the defenders' play. When following suit, it's usually wise to play low if you are the second player to play to the trick and high if you're in third position.

However, these rules are only a guideline; you have to think at bridge and study the positions to know when to break the rules. Here is what author Roth has to say about it: "Mistakes in this area can often be avoided if you consider the basic reason for playing third-hand high. Usually, you will be hoping to win the trick outright or to knock out a high card from declarer in order to promote a trick for the defenders. If it is clear that neither applies, then it may well be wrong to dive in head first."

"Strangely, while I was in the process of writing this chapter, I watched two hands come up, within a quarter-of-an-hour of each other, where West had to sit helplessly as his partner cruelly swung the ace."

Roth now discusses the hand in today's diagram. I have added to it by supplying a bidding sequence. South opens two notrump, showing 20-to-22 points and North bids three clubs, Stayman, asking for a four-card major.

When South denies a major with his bid of three diamonds, North invites a slam by jumping to four notrump. Notice that four notrump is not Blackwood here, because there hasn't been a trump suit agreed upon. South, with a maximum point count for his opening two notrump, accepts the slam invitation by bidding six notrump.

West, not wanting to give South any help on the opening lead, carefully selects the six of spades for his lead. Spades is the one suit, from West's point of view, that is least likely to hurt the defense. On the six of spades, declarer calls for dummy's 4. If you are sitting East, which card do you play, and would it make any difference if declarer had called for the queen of spades?

Roth answers: "This is the kind of situation where parrot rules lay out the surest route to disaster. What is the spade situation? Clearly, South has the ace of spades - who is underleading an ace against a slam when sitting over a two-notrump opener? Once you have established this, you are well on the way to finding the correct defense."

If South has four spades, your king is dead, regardless of your defense. (In this case, South has denied four spades.) If he has fewer, the ace will drop in three rounds while your king remains intact so that declarer will make three rather than four spade tricks - all the difference in the world."

Declarer makes only 11 tricks if East plays low to the first trick. Still, it may not be easy for East to visualize the position. A good idea is for East to assume that his partner has led passively against a slam contract; now he can visualize South's strong holding.

Another rule of thumb that would be wise for East to break is, "Cover an honor with an honor." Suppose West had led a heart on opening lead and declarer started the spade suit himself by leading the queen of spades from dummy. Again it would be right for East to play low (rather than cover the honor). East must think: he cannot play by rules alone.

Chess The Indian open

By NIGEL SHORT

I have always wanted to visit India, for where else does one get the chance to drive the wrong way down one-way streets with a police escort? Life is perilous certainly, but what fun! This might also describe my feelings about open tournaments, which could explain why Calcutta is my first open tournament in about 10 years.

Open tournaments require a different discipline to the closed events where players are more evenly matched. Instead of striving to equalize with the black pieces, it is necessary to take a few risks in order to win, as only the high-scorers receive a worthwhile prize.

The first few rounds witnessed quite a number of upsets. - Calcutta's very own grand master Barua succumbed in the first round to Vijayalakshmi, the top Indian woman. His suffering continued when, in the third round, he reached the following position against the wonderfully named but lowly-ranked Harikrishna.

Black: (Harikrishna) to play

White: (Barua)

Harikrishna played 1. ...Qf7+ and a draw was agreed because after 2. Qxf7 Black is stalemated - a nice trick to remember.

Another lowly ranked Indian, Neelakantan, produced a major upset in the second round against the Hungarian grand master Horvath.

1. e4 g5 2. d4 Bg7 3. Nc3 d6 4. Be3 a6. Once upon a time such an opening would have been dismissed as complete nonsense. Black has neglected to establish a foothold in the center and, instead of developing his pieces, makes abstract pawn moves on the wing. However, it is not at all without point: by preserving his flexibility Black intends to strike at the White center from the flanks. 5. Qd2 b5 6. B3 Nd7 7. Nf3. A mysterious move which I can only explain by saying that White probably is not a terribly strong player. After 7. h4 b5 then 8. Nh3 makes a lot of sense as the knight will secure the g5 outpost. Doubtless White got confused here. 7. ...Bb7 8. Be2 e5 9. d5 Ng6 10. Bh6 0-0 11. 0-0 Bxh6 12. Qxh6 e6. So far, so good. Black has unbalanced the position and apart from a slightly vulnerable king, stands rather well. 13. dxe6 fxe6 14. Rad1 Qe7 15. Ng5 Rae8 16. f4?!

Objectively this move is completely unsound but when you are massively outranked by your opponent it pays to be optimistic. 16. ...b4. Oops! Now the e-pawn is hanging.

Black: (Horvath)

White: (Neelakantan) to play

17. Be4. In for a penny, in for a pound. 17. ...bxc3 18. Bxe6+ Kh8 19. e5 dxe5 20. dxe5 Rd8?? It is very hard to explain why Horvath failed to play the completely obvious 21. Rde1 Qc7 Black is just winning. Now he is crushed in style. 21. Bxd7 Nxd7 22. Rxf8+ Nxf8 23. Nf7+! If 23. Rxd8? Qxd8 24. Nf7+ Kg8 25. Nxd8 cxb2 and Black wins. 23. ...Qx7? Utterly confused, Black misses his last chance. After 23. ...Kg8 24. Nxd8 cxb2 the game continues. 24. Rxd8 Kg8 25. e6! Qe7 26. Qxh8+! Doubtless overlooked by Black 26. ...Qxh8 27. e7! Black resigned.

Eisenberg, DSW, China in $450 million venture

By DAN GERSTENFELD

Dead Sea Works and the Eisenberg Group of Companies have finalized an agreement with the Chinese authorities to construct a potash plant in China at an estimated investment of $450 million.

The new plant, which will be constructed in Goumud in the Qighai region, will be jointly held by the two companies and the Chinese government, which will own two-thirds of the joint venture.

Dead Sea Works is a subsidiary of Israel Chemicals, which is controlled by the Eisenberg Group through the Israel Corporation. The negotiations on the agreement originally involved the late business tycoon Shaul Eisenberg, who built 280 factories in China.

According to the agreement, Dead Sea Works will be responsible for the technology transfer, the construction and the start-up of the plant.

The plant is to employ 1,400 workers and to have an annual production capacity of 800,000 tons. A Dead Sea Works spokesman said that the output is earmarked for the local market and will not compete with Dead Sea Works products. According to estimates, the Chinese import three million tons of potash a year. Last month Dead Sea Works announced investments of $90m. to expand its potash manufacturing capacity to 2.75 million tons a year in order to enter new markets abroad.

Shaul Ben-Zeev, the company's president and CEO, said that the agreement is a significant breakthrough in the international operations of the company as it enters one of the most important and developing markets.

Israel Corp. CEO Erwin Eisenberg said that potash consumption in China has increased in past years as it is used to fertilize arable agricultural land. He added that the Chinese authorities have been seeking a joint venture that would ensure the supply of potash to the agricultural sector in coming years.

Dead Sea Works said that the negotiations accelerated during the last few months after the parties agreed to update the feasibility study of the joint venture.

According to Eisenberg, after conducting an international survey the Chinese found the Israeli technology preferable to all other alternatives.

The memorandum of understanding has been signed by Woo Goh Tai, senior executive of the Chinese Ministry of Mining, and the chairman of Mingda, the local partner in the joint venture.

Zilberfarb denies opposing central bank's policy

By DAVID HARRIS

During a meeting of the Knesset Finance Committee, it became apparent that Treasury Director-General Ben-Zion Zilberfarb is unhappy with the Bank of Israel's monetary policy. MKs Amnon Rubinstein (Meretz), Avraham Shohat (Labor), and Avraham Ravitz (United Torah Judaism) said yesterday.

Following the meeting, Zilberfarb vigorously denied this and said the central bank is on the right track in reducing interest rates.

The disagreement began when Shohat produced a letter from Zilberfarb criticizing central bank policy. The letter, sent to Shohat when Zilberfarb was a university professor in July 1996, accuses the central bank of implementing "incorrect monetary policies since 1995."

Zilberfarb reportedly told the committee: "I could write things when I was in academia that I can't say now."

Shohat told reporters that Zilberfarb said that "it is impossible to keep the real interest rate at 7 percent, at that rate it is difficult for the economy to grow."

Following the meeting, Zilberfarb claimed he did not criticize the bank's current policies. "The path that the central bank has adopted in recent months is correct and must continue," said Zilberfarb. "In this period of reducing inflation and inflationary expectations, there must be a gradual reduction of interest rates." This he said must apply to both nominal and real-term rates.

The exchanges took place just 12 hours after the cabinet approved the ministry's NIS 1 billion proposal to reduce unemployment by investing in infrastructure projects.

State Budget Director David Milgrom hit out at ministers who said the program will lead to increased unemployment. "You increase infrastructure spending by NIS 1b. and people claim this will mean more unemployment - this is ridiculous," he said.

There was cross-party criticism of the Treasury package. Michael Kleiner, coalition leader on the committee, described the plan as "insufficient. They're taking money to fund the program from the wrong places and let's face it, the jobs being created aren't exactly for Jews."

Committee chairman Ravitz added: "As opposed to what I heard from [Finance Minister Yaakov] Neeman, this program won't necessarily bring down unemployment and certainly not in large numbers."

Israel, Slovenia ink free trade deal

By NINA GILBERT

Industry and Trade Minister Nathan Sharansky and Slovenian Economics and Foreign Trade Minister Marjan Senjur yesterday signed a free trade agreement between their countries in Jerusalem, after two years of negotiations.

Israel has already signed free trade agreements with other central and eastern European countries, including Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic and Slovakia. It is also negotiating an accord with Romania.

These countries and Slovenia have association agreements with the European Union which resulted in discrimination against Israeli goods.

The free trade agreements eliminate this discrimination, thus providing a potential boost for Israeli products to compete in eastern European markets.

For its part, Slovenia is seeking Israeli investments, technology and joint ventures in areas in which Israel has a comparative advantage, including telecommunications, agro-chemicals and medical equipment.

Under the agreement, most products will immediately enjoy a full exemption from tariffs.

In 1997, bilateral trade between Israel and Slovenia was $77 million, with Israeli exports totaling $70 million, mainly electrical appliances and electronics, machinery, telecommunications products and agro-chemicals.

Clal Ind. buys 11% of Fundtech for NIS 68m.

By Jerusalem Post Staff

Clal Industries and Investments announced yesterday that it has signed an agreement to purchase 10.7 percent of software developer Fundtech for NIS 68 million.

In a statement to the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, Clal said 4.2% of Fundtech was bought from Primavera Investments for NIS 27m. and the sale of another 6.5% for NIS 41m. would be completed in the coming days.

Ramat Gan-based Fundtech designs and develops software products to electronically process payments, transfer funds and manage cash transfers. Two months ago the company raised $39m. through an initial public offering on Nasdaq. The recent deal is in line with Clal's strategy of focusing on high-tech companies with high growth potential while selling its stakes in unprofitable companies.

Clal Industries, a subsidiary of Clal Israel, the country's second-largest conglomerate, has been working to change its image from a conservative holding company to a more dynamic technology-oriented firm since Rimmon Ben-Shaoul was appointed its president and CEO last year.

Last month Clal acquired 9.3% of the Israeli manufacturer of paging networks, Nexus Telecommunications Systems, for NIS 22m.

Last month the company completed the sale of a 51% stake in Zion United Cable Works to Superior Telecom for NIS 90m.

Discount Invest. buys 21% of Tambour for $31m.

By DAN GERSTENFELD

Discount Investments yesterday announced that it has exercised an option to buy 20.7 percent of Tambour, Israel's leading paint manufacturer, from a subsidiary of Mashav Initiating & Development for $31 million.

Discount, together with affiliate PEC Israel Economic Corporation, now holds 85.35% of Tambour. The remaining shares are traded on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

Discount CEO Dov Tadmor said that the company plans to sell part of its holdings in Tambour to an international company in the paint industry.

The deal was announced only one day after Tambour published disappointing first-quarter results. Analysts said the transaction stands in clear contrast to Discount's strategy of focusing on companies with high growth potential that are mainly in the fields of communications, infrastructure and financial services.

"I don't understand how it sits alongside Discount's strategy," said Shai Weinberg, an analyst at Solid Capital Markets. "There is nothing interesting in raising holdings in the low-tech sector at a time when everybody else is trying to get out."

He added that Tambour operates in a very competitive sector in which companies don't generate high returns. Prices in the sector have been falling since the market was opened to imported goods, causing Tambour's profitability to decline. In addition, the whole sector was hit by a slow down in the building industry.

The latest evidence of Tambour's falling profitability came on Tuesday, when the company reported that first-quarter net profit fell 50% to NIS 2.7 million from NIS 5.5m. a year earlier.

Tadmor said, however, that the company views the investment in Tambour as a long-term investment.

"Tambour has an important role in the Israeli industry and I believe that we can bring in top-quality strategic partners," Tadmor said. "Our main line continues to be high growth."

The purchase, which was done through a subsidiary of Discount, is an outcome of an agreement between Israel's largest holding companies, Koor Industries and Clal Israel. The two conglomerates agreed last April to end their joint control of Mashav. Under the terms of that agreement, Koor raised its stake in ECI Telecom by 10% in return for an option to sell 25% of Mashav to Clal. Koor and Clal said at the time that Mashav would sell some of its holdings, including Tambour.

According to press reports, Poalim Investments also had been interested in buying Mashav's holdings in Tambour for the same price.

Mashav announced that following the sale of the paint maker it will write a capital gain of NIS 22m.

SuperSol, Israel Chem. lead stocks up

Tel Aviv

Stocks rose for a fifth day, led by SuperSol, Israel's largest super-market chain, on better-than-expected earnings, and by Israel Chemicals, on speculation the government's sale of one-third of the company will lead to a battle for control.

SuperSol gained 3 percent to NIS 12.60, and Israel Chemicals rose 1.8 percent to NIS 4.53. That helped the Maof index of 25 largest companies to add 0.40 percent to 339.75, a new high.

The supermarket said first-quarter earnings rose 88 percent to NIS 38.9 million as it boosted sales at recently acquired food stores and after it sold an unprofitable Hungarian food chain.

The quarter was "above expectations" of NIS 36.7 million, in earnings because of improved "efficiency in selling" at the Shekhem supermarkets last year, said Tal Liani, an analyst at Zannex Securities, who has a "long-term buy" on the stock. Liani said the Shekhem stores, taken over in February last year, increased selling space and reduced areas used for storage, leading to a "sharp improvement in operating profit that affected the bottom line."

Israel Chemicals gained after the Maor newspaper reported that Tzipi Livni, the head of the Government Companies Authority, said the government will begin preparations next week to sell its 35 percent stake in Israel Chemicals. Livni was unavailable for comment.

That has prompted speculation that a number of investors could seek to buy the stake and gain control of Israel Chemicals, because it is unclear whether Israel Chem., which now controls the company and has the first option to buy the state's stake, can raise the money for the purchase, said Boaz Leviatan, an analyst at Sahar Securities.

Asia

Japanese stocks were little changed as falls by banks on concern political strife in Indonesia will ripple through Asian markets offset gains by electronics makers on buying by public pension funds.

"Investors are getting cold feet about banks' exposure to Asia," said Yoshio Inamura, an assistant general manager at Tokyo-Mitsubishi Asset Management Ltd. "But public pension managers have got to buy something."

The Nikkei 225 stock index rose 21.33 points, or 0.14 percent, to 15,343.81. The broader Topix index of all shares on the first section of the Tokyo Stock Exchange climbed 1.70 points, or 0.14 percent, to 1,206.56.

Sumitomo Bank Ltd. fell 26 yen to 1,205 as reports of a merger with Indonesia's Bank of Asia dealt a blow to Asian currency and stock markets, exacerbating concerns regional borrowers will struggle to pay back loans.

Sony Corp. rose 240 yen to 11,180 as government-linked pension funds bought companies seen to offer strong long-term profit potential. Share prices also got a boost during the final minutes of trading from a report Nomura Securities Co. and Industrial Bank of Japan Ltd. will form a joint venture offering individual asset management services.

Europe

European shares ended higher but well off their best levels yesterday, pulled in both directions by capricious trading on Wall Street, which raced higher soon after the opening bell only to fall back later.

Traders on both sides of the Atlantic had several reasons to be cautious as they sought to interpret the latest economic run and make sense of a string of unsettling events in Asia.

The latest batch of US data - producer price and retail sales - suggested little reason to expect an imminent rise in US interest rates but the mood remained anxious ahead of next week's US monetary policy meeting.

But blue chip shares in Frankfurt and Paris still managed gains of around 1.2 and 0.8 percent respectively, with Paris ringing up a new record close.

London's FTSE index was more circumspect after wages data and insights into the central bank's interest rate policy. The FTSE ended around 0.27 percent higher.

Europe's largest bourse, London's FTSE 100 index, ended near the middle of its day's trading range.

Earlier, investors had decided to stay on the sidelines in case of any upset from a heavy batch of economic data and the Bank of England's quarterly inflation report.

An unexpected sharp bounce in average earnings dragged the index back from a best of 6,000. February average earnings growth jumped to 4.9 percent versus expectations of a 4.5 percent rise.

But the market took some comfort from Bank of England comments that inflation was expected to remain close to its 2.5 percent target over the next two years.

The French market was bolstered by gains in the oil sector on the back of higher crude prices, traders said.

The CAC-40 index rose 32.43 points to 4,019.76. Its previous all-time best was 4,017.24 and it set a fresh intraday peak of 4,045.77.

Frankfurt shares, after a brief afternoon rally above the 5,400-point level, eased back while holding on to a more than 1 percent gain.

The continuing strength of the DAX - the index is up 27 percent since January 1 and 87 percent since the end of 1996 - has apparently not raised as much concern in Germany as the Dow's bull run has in the US.

Bundesbank council member Olaf Sievert said the DAX's gains were little cause for concern.

Wall Street

NEW YORK (AP) - The Dow Jones industrial average coasted to a new high yesterday, with US stocks and bonds looking like an increasingly safe bet amid the latest relapse in Asia's economic and social turmoil.

The Dow rose 50.07 points - or 0.5 percent - to 9,211.84, beating May 4's record close of 9,192.66. The blue-chip barometer has now risen four consecutive sessions, gaining about 235 points.

Most broad-market indexes also posted modest gains, but remained well below record territory, underscoring the recent preference for the blue-chip stocks.

For the second day in a row, stocks drew key support from the bond market, where the yield on the 30-year Treasury - a key determinant of borrowing costs - fell further below 6 percent.

The renewed uncertainty overseas distracted attention from some potentially unsettling economic data released before yesterday's open. The Labor Department reported that prices charged by factories and other producers rose in April for the first time in seven months, while the Commerce Department said retail sales rebounded after a lull in March.

The Standard and Poor's 500 rose 3.07 to 1,118.86, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 6.01 to 1,866.17.

Declining issues outnumbered advances by a slim margin on the New York Stock Exchange, with 1,427 up, 1,552 down and 556 unchanged.

NYSE volume totaled 599.25 million shares as of 4 p.m., vs. 600.91 million in the previous session.

Yen little changed amid concern Japan to sell dollars

The dollar was little changed against the yen as concern that Japan may sell dollars offset gains generated by tumbling Asian financial markets.

"Japan may do whatever it can to keep the yen from weakening," said John Praven, global market strategist at BEA Associates, which oversees $30 billion. "The yen is very critical in the whole Asian crisis. If the yen weakens, that will only have a domino effect on the rest of Asia."

The dollar was at 134.09 yen, little changed from 133.98 yen Tuesday. The US currency rose to 1.7782 marks from 1.7767 marks.

Yen weakness makes Japanese exports less expensive. Because Japan competes with many countries in Asia, a falling yen can add to pressure on those countries' currencies. It also can diminish the allure of Japanese financial assets.

In earlier trading, the dollar rose to a five-week high of 134.48 yen as signs of turmoil in Asia soured investors on yen.

"All the trouble going on in Asia - the riots in Indonesia, markets falling, and swings in interest rates" are driving investors to the "safe haven" of the dollar, said Robert Katz, a currency trader at MTB Bank.

Indonesia's economy edged closer to collapse, with the rupiah plunging 11 percent and the benchmark stock index tumbling 6.6 percent amid growing protests for the ouster of President Suharto. Stocks also fell in Hong Kong, Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand, Taiwan, and the Philippines.

Concern that Asian turmoil would prolong Japan's economic slump sent the benchmark Japanese government bond yield to a new low of 1.29 percent. Declining Asian currencies and securities prices hurt the yen because Japan is Asia's biggest creditor, and needs to be repaid those loans to help its own struggling economy.

"With the rest of Asia in crisis, Japan is the most directly affected," said BEA's Praven. "Weakness in Asia leads to yen weakness."

Interest rates in Hong Kong rose amid concern falling Asian stocks will drag down the value of the Hong Kong dollar. Hong Kong's currency is among the last in Asia pegged to the US dollar.

"Further destabilization in the region is putting pressure on the yen and other currencies there," said Mark Turner, chief investment officer at Schooner Asset Management Co. in Boston.

Silver prices fall after US declares India sanctions

Precious metals

Silver fell after US President Bill Clinton decided to impose economic sanctions against India, the metal's biggest importer, in response to surprise nuclear weapons tests. Spot silver fell 9 cents to $5.50 an ounce in interbank trading.

Gold dropped as a falling Japanese yen made the dollar-priced metal more expensive and discouraged buying in the world's fifth largest gold consumer. The American currency's gain means Japanese jewelers and industrial users tend to avoid spot purchases, traders said. Spot gold fell $1.75 to $296.25 an ounce in interbank trading.

Sampras avenges Paris defeat in Rome

ROME (Reuters) - World No. 1 Pete Sampras beat Sweden's Magnus Norman 7-6 6-4 yesterday to avenge last year's defeat at Roland Garros and book a place in the third round of the Italian Open.

Sampras needed more than two hours to grind down Norman, who had won their third-round tie in Paris to wreck the American's long-cherished dream of winning the one grand slam event to have eluded him.

American Todd Martin had earlier given sixth seed Yevgeny Kafelnikov a scare by romping through the first set with the loss of only one game. But the Russian fought back to win the second on a tie-break before grinding Martin down in the deciding set to win 1-6 7-6 6-3.

Dutchman Sjeng Schalken, who stunned US Open champion Pat Rafter on Tuesday, lost 6-2 3-6 1-6 to New Zealand's Brett Steven. While Moroccan left-hander Hicham Arzi who beat Petr Korda on the opening day, crumpled to a 6-3 3-6 2-6 defeat at the hands of Spanish-qualifier Fernando Vicente.

In the women's German Open in Berlin, Martina Hingis blew past veteran Italian Silvia Farina 6-0, 7-5 to reach the third round.

Sixth-seeded Mary Pierce of France was forced to withdraw after straining her left thigh against Austrian Barbara Paulus, while trailing, 6-4, 6-7 (1-7), 1-3.

South Africa's Amanda Coetzer, the fourth seed, edged Germany's Andrea Glass, 6-0, 4-6, 6-1.

Spain's Conchita Martinez, seeded No. 7, also reached the third round by ousting compatriot Magui Serna, 6-2, 6-2, while No. 8 Irina Spiraea of Romania wore easily against American Meghann Shaughnessy, 6-4, 6-1.

Cup Winners Cup to Chelsea

STOCKHOLM (Reuters) - A superb goal from Italian wizard Gianfranco Zola 23 seconds after coming on as a second half substitute gave Chelsea a 1-0 victory over VfB Stuttgart in the Cup Winners' Cup final last night.

Zola, who has been out of the Chelsea side for three weeks through injury, replaced Tore Andre Flo in the 71st minute and with his second touch collected a perfect pass from Dennis Wise and blasted a shot past Stuttgart keeper Franz Wohlfahrt.

In a disappointing game both sides finished with 10 men after Chelsea's Dan Petrescu was sent off five minutes from time for a foul on Murat Yakin and Gerbard Poschner followed him on full time.

Stuttgart's best chance fell to Nigerian striker Jonathan Akpoborie in the ninth minute but he hesitated with only the keeper to beat and passed.

It was Chelsea's second Cup Winners' Cup title following their success in 1971 against Real Madrid.

Chelsea player-manager Gianluca Vialli said: "We don't want to stop here, we want to keep improving and next season we will start the season thinking about winning the premier league which is now our target."

Earlier in the day Italian club Lazio confirmed they were holding talks with Chelsea over the possible sale of their international striker Pierluigi Casiraghi to the Londoners.

"There are negotiations, it's true, but that's about it," a Lazio club spokesman told Reuters. "At this stage it's impossible to say how they will end but Chelsea are certainly in pole position to sign Casiraghi."

Given that we're at the end of the season and with the World Cup coming along soon, I imagine the deal will be settled very soon, one way or the other," the spokesman added.

According to media reports in Italy, Chelsea have offered $10 million for the burly 29-year-old player, $2 million below Lazio's asking price.

Chelsea already have three Italians on their books - player-manager Vialli, midfielder Roberto Di Matteo and playmaker Zola.

Casiraghi has scored 13 goals in 44 appearances for Italy, including the winning strike against Russia in a World Cup play-off in Naples last November which clinched Italy's place at France 98.

He has made no secret of his desire to leave Lazio after five seasons with the Rome club, who have a surfeit of options up front following the signing of Chilean Marcelo Salas for next season.

UK papers warned about jingoistic World Cup coverage

LONDON (Reuters) - Britain's strident tabloid newspapers, renowned for their outrageous insults to foreigners, were warned yesterday to beware of inciting violence during next month's World Cup.

Alarmed by a recent tabloid exhortation to give a good kicking to French World Cup organizers, Britain's press watchdog told newspaper editors to tread carefully during the six-week tournament.

"We don't mind people being partisan and we want British teams to win. But I don't want British newspapers inadvertently or in any way inciting fans to violence or to cause trouble," said Press Complaints Commission (PCC) chairman Lord Wakeham.

Both England and Scotland are competing in the World Cup in France, which like Germany is a soft target for jingoistic tabloid newspapers who often portray soccer as a pitched battle between warring nations.

"Achtung! Surrender for you Fritz," ran one headline in the Mirror tabloid in 1996 as England prepared to meet Germany in the semi-final of the European soccer championships, held in England.

Germany won the tournament, which was noted for the good behavior of home fans who in the 1980s were notorious for creating mayhem.

The story that provoked yesterday's warning to all newspaper editors came from the tabloid Daily Star, complaining about the French not allocating enough tickets to British fans for the World Cup in June.

"A good kicking on their gallic derrieres (back-sides) is the only language the greedy frogs understand," the Star told its readers, reminding them of English victories over the French at Waterloo and Agincourt.

The British press is policed by a self-regulatory code of conduct.

But the PCC said it could not fine or censure the Star because its guidelines on discrimination affect only a named person rather than groups or nations as a whole.

Jazz, Lakers win series, to meet in West finals

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) - Karl Malone had 24 points and 13 rebounds as the Utah Jazz advanced to the Western Conference finals for the fourth time in five National Basketball Association seasons with an 87-77 victory over the San Antonio Spurs on Tuesday night.

Utah will meet the Los Angeles Lakers, who eliminated Seattle in the Western Conference finals.

The Jazz, who never trailed and held the Spurs to 38.4 percent shooting, made an 11-4 run early in the fourth quarter to put the game out of reach.

San Antonio's Triple Towers frontcourt of David Robinson, Tim Duncan and Will Perdue managed just 35 points and 31 rebounds, their lowest totals of the series. Utah also outscored the Spurs 41-39.

Utah, which holds homecourt advantage throughout the playoffs, eliminated the Spurs from the postseason for the third time in the last five years. The Spurs remained winless in eight postseason games at the Delta Center.

The first Western Conference final game will be played Saturday at Salt Lake City's Delta Center.

Lakers 110, SuperSonics 95

The Los Angeles Lakers have the most momentum in the playoffs and it has carried them to their first Western Conference final since 1991.

The Lakers, getting 31 points, nine rebounds and eight blocked shots from Shaquille O'Neal, finished their rout of the Seattle SuperSonics with a 110-95 victory Tuesday night in Seattle.

The Lakers, who won 22 of their last 25 regular-season games and beat Portland 3-1 in the opening round of the playoffs, lost the first game of the best-of-7 series to the Sonics then won four straight.

It was a painful night for the Sonics, whose coach, George Karl, isn't expected to be back next season. Karl's contract expires on July 1 and he probably won't be offered a new one by Seattle despite his regular-season winning percentage of .719.

Eddie Jones and Rick Fox each had 17 points for the Lakers, while Nick Van Exel had 15. Los Angeles set a franchise playoff record with 13 3-pointers, five by Fox.

Vin Baker led Seattle with 28 points, while Gary Payton added 20.

Golfer Shochet wins Sam Sharrow tourney

By HEATHER CHAIT

Neil Shochet won last weekend's two-day Sam Sharrow 36-hole golf tournament, named after the first Jewish professional golfer in the US who also helped promote the sport here.

Leading after the first day was 1997 club champion Kobi Hacham with a gross 72 one under par.

Neil Shochet followed with a par 73 and Avi Cotten was third with 77, tied with 15-year-old junior club champion Shlomi Assayag.

On day two, Shochet shot a gross 75 for total of 148 strokes, two over par. Hacham took second place with 151 and Assayag was third with a total of 156.

In the net competition of the championship 13-year-old Eliran Avnaim was first with 143 strokes in the A division with Assayag second on 144.

Shmueli Futeran and Howard Goldsmith were first and second in the B division with 153 and 154 respectively.

Chuck Shaikowitz and Aviva Dankner won the 18-hole couples stableford, two balls to count competition, with 68 stableford points, five over par.

Husband and wife team Karson and Shirley Kosowsky were second with 67 and Yitzhak Dankner and Eli Hasson were third, also with 67, but an inferior back nine.

Australia to complain to IRB over weakened England rugby tour

LONDON (Reuters) - Angry Australian rugby officials will tell the world governing body next week that at least one English club pressured its players to miss England's tour of the southern hemisphere next month.

England named a 37-strong squad on Tuesday containing 17 new caps and a fresh captain in scrumhalf Matt Dawson. At least a dozen leading players were unavailable through injury or for personal reasons.

At a news conference in Sydney yesterday, Australian Rugby Union (ARU) managing director John O'Neill said London club Richmond had set conditions for releasing its players for international duty.

"I have a letter from the Richmond Football Club which was written to their players on the 27th of April stating that the international season is coming up and here are the conditions that Richmond is putting on players being released," O'Neill said.

O'Neill said he had discussed the subject with the New Zealand Rugby Football Union (NZRFU) and added the evidence would be presented at next week's International Rugby Board (IRB) executive committee meeting in Dublin.

The Australian claim was greeted with surprise by Richmond officials. A spokeswoman for the club said four Richmond players had been included in the tour party and

Shearer acquittal greeted with disbelief

LONDON (Reuters) - The decision by the Football Association to clear England and Newcastle striker Alan Shearer of deliberately kicking an opponent in the head was greeted in disbelief in parts of the British media yesterday.

Television replays showed Shearer's boot connecting with the face of Leicester's Neil Lennon in a premier league match on April 29.

But Shearer argued he had merely been trying to free his leg and on Tuesday the FA handed down a not guilty verdict.

However, in the eyes of some British newspapers, it also delivered a kick in the face for natural justice.

"Shearer's graceless conduct is compounded by the pathetic and spineless response of the Football Association which yesterday turned a blind eye to the film footage and found him not guilty," said the Daily Mail.

The Express blasted the way the FA had handled the affair, particularly the manner in which Shearer had been whisked out of club training session ahead of Saturday's FA Cup final against Arsenal to the Sheffield hearing on Tuesday.

The hearing had been originally scheduled for next Monday and most of the media were focused on England coach Glenn Hoddle's announcement of a 30-man pre-World Cup squad in London.

"If Shearer had nothing to hide, why did the English Football Association, the England coach and the Professional Footballers' Association go to such lengths to hide him yesterday?" The Express asked.

The Sun columnist while hesitating to use the word "whitewash" felt "double standards" had operated over the England captain, while the Daily Telegraph felt that FA's handling of the case had not "always been as it should have."

The hearing had the benefit of a second camera angle which according to the Telegraph offered less damning evidence than that seen over and over again by millions of TV viewers since the incident happened.
